"Frof, Petree is distinguished in all his writings, from his Elements of Geometry to his Analytic Mechanics, by a peculiarity in his modes of proof. His demonstrations are always coucles, and remarkable for the directness with which they attain their end. In the present volume is an instance in which a proposition is established by a few lines of argument as clearly and incontrovertibly as by the dozen pages which the first propounder of the theorem employed in its proof."—Rav. Pelagius, from whom we have the theological term Pelagianism, is supposed to have been born in Wales during the fourth century, was originally named Morgan, (Celtic Mor, sea. gan, horn, -Greek, Helayor, -Latin, Pelugius,) and is said to have been Abbot of Bangor. About 400, accompanied by Coelestius, an Irish monk, he travelled to Rome, and there excited a violent commotion by opposing the doctrines taught by St. Augustine respecting original sin, irresistible grace, and eternal election. His principal opponents among his contemporaries were Augustine, Jerome, Prosper, and Fulgentius. He was banished from Italy by the emperor Honorius, and is supposed to have returned to his monastery at Bangor, and to have died there, after spreading his doctrines in Great Britain. The best-known of his writings are: 1. Treatise upon the Trinity. 2. A Commentary on St. Paul's Epistles. Annexed to the Commentaries of St. Jerome, and, absurdly enough, long supposed to have been written by the latter. 3. A Book of Eclogues; or, Spiritual Maxims. 4. Letters. Among these is an epis-tle addressed to a virgin named Demetrias, which is printed in the works of St. Jerome. 5. Pieces in his own defence. 6. Treatise on Free Will. 7. Pelagius's Creed, which he sent to Pope Innocent for his own vindication. Trans. into English, with Notes on the Creed, by W. Wall, Vicar of Shoreham, in his History of Infant Baptism, Lon., 1705, 8vo. The History of Pelagianism, Baptism, Lon., 1705, 8vo. The History of relegionism, by Jansenius, in his Treatise Augustinus, seu de Doctrina St. Augustini de Humanæ Naturæ Sanitate, &c., Louvain, 1640, Rotham., 1652, fol., (on which the author was employed above twenty years,) presents a portraiture of Pelagianism as viewed by a realous enemy; but he who would have "the learning" of the subject must not who would have "the learning" of the subject must not forget to consult, also, the works of Laet; Gerard Vossius; Le Clerc; the Jesuits Longueval and Patouillet; Dupin; Cave; Mosheim; Milner; Milman; Cardinal Noris; Archbishop Usher, (Antiq. Eccles. Brit.;) and Father Garnici, (Supp. Oper. Theodoreti;) and if the exploration of these volumes leave him still unsatisfied, the will find further materials of study in the writings of supply the divines against and modern Grack Capabile. many other divines, ancient and modern, Greek Catholic, Boman Catholic, and Protestant.

"The Pelagian doctrine, which was first agitated A.D. 405, was condemned, in the space of ten years, at Rome and Carthage. St. Augustin fought and conquered; but the Grock Church was Envourable to his adversaries; and (what is singular enough) the people did not take any part in a dispute they could not understand."—Gipson: Decime and Fall of the R. Penn, Samuel. Tanies of weight in provide away. Brass, &c., oth ed., 1843, ob Penn, William, Oct 1t, 1644-July 30, 1718, the only son of hir William Penn, knight, Admiral and General of the Fleet during the luteriegnum, Admiral and Commissioner of the Admiralty and Nay after the Postantian was a patrix of Loudon, and educated as a Restoration, was a native of Loudon, and educated at 3 private academy of that place, after a course of pag-immary matruction at Chigwell, in Essex. In 7660 he was entered a gentleman commoner of Christ Church, Oxford, and soon evinced a religious real which would have been better appreciated by his superiors had it been displayed according to the orthodox standard of his college. The fervent appeals of Thomas Loe had aroused the consciences of many of the students, and they had endeavoured to strengthen each other's faith by private meetings for prayer and religious exhortation. This innovation, the offence of which was aggravated by a neglect of the worship of the Established Church, was punished by the exaction of the college fine for Nonconformity At last matters were brought to an open rupture by an attempt on the part of Pena and some others of the youthful nonconformists to tear from the backs of several of the students the surplices which they had lately assumed (a revival of an ancient oustom) in obedience to the king s command There violent reformers were dismissed from college, and those who had no scruple respecting the scademical vestment were pormitted to wear the offending garment in peace
William now returned to his father a house, but he soon discovered that he had only changed his seems of discipline the heads of his college could not be more opposed to the religious observances of the student than as the worldly-minded and punctilious old admiral to what he considered the uncouth manners of a son for whom he had high hopes of courtly favour,-which, indeed, his own patriotic exertions had well described of his sovereigns. But it Chimham stood in the way of his own advancement, who could be expected to further his: cause? Commands, entreaties, repreaches, and—if the truth must be told—blows, even, were alternately tried in vain, and the youthful confessor was driven from his father's house without a paternal henediction William's offence was too great for ingreeness,—at least, for immediate forgiveness Had he consented to drink and mediate forgiveness carouse, to swear inchionable onthe, and indulge in the other pleasures and hounses usual with the young gentlemen of his condition, there need have been no separa-tion between father and son irregularities would not have been severely visited, and even profligacy would perhaps have escaped with a mild administration of discipline But to say "thee, when the best standards of colloquial usage had consented to forget their grammars and pluralize individuals, to refuse to attend the worship of the Latablished (hurch, and to persist in uniting in devotional exercises with other obstinate Dissenters from the prevailing communion,—to keep the head covered in presence of rank, and even of royalty itself, and to have no better justification for these shocking deviations than a supposed conformity with the requisitions of Scripture, and obedience to "the light within," by which that Scripture was supposed to be best interpreted,—who sould forgive offences of this aggravated character? But to be serious how unblamably, how holily, this young martyr walked before God and man,—how worthy of admiration, and of veneration, was the character of William Penn at a period of life when youth is too generally admitted as an excuse for folly, and even for crime, may be inferred from his noble defiance to a wretched creature of the Government, whe, having in vain endeavoured to entrap him into taking an oath, vented his spleen by attacking princi-ples the loftiness of which the magnanimous magistrate found himself entirely unable to comprehend:

found himself entirely unable to comprehend:

"An alterection ensued, in the course of which the justice having instructed that, in spite of his sanctified exterior, the young preacher was as had as other folks in his practice, the Quaker forgot, for one moment, the systematic mechanism composure of his sect, and burst out into this triumphant appeal. I make this bold challenge to all men, women, sate this order of the sect, and burst out into this triumphant appeal. in "this enlightened age." But Admiral Penn was acceptaned to obedience; and, as the son could not obey ther and conscience both, the claims of the latter prewhile, and, as we have already seen, William was ejected from the paternal mansion. It is gratifying to be able to record the fact that, before the stern discipligrien closed his eyes in death, he was constrained, by the pawer of truth, to bear testimony to the excellence of that principle in the strongth of which the persecuted gon might have well said, even at this early ago, od self-exaltation been one of his characteristics,- have more understanding than my teachers."

"Son William," exclaimed the dying father, "let nothing in this world tempt you to wrong your conscience. I charge you, do nothing against your conscience. So will you keep peace at home, which will be a feast to you in the day of trouble."

How must these words—unwillingly and painfully, indeed, yet not without consulatory reflections-have re-eatled to the mind of "Son William" the memory of his earlier days! But we anticipate.

In the same year (1862) the stout young Quaker was sent to travel on the continent; remained for some time in Paris,—where he so far countenanced the use of carnal weapons (a compliance which he subsequently regretted) as to disarm with his sword an antagonist who threatened his life with a similar weapon; studied at Saumur under the famous Moses Amyrault; thence proceeded to Turin; and returned home in 1664, as accomplished a member of the Society of Friends as ever graced the ranks of that estimable communion. He was now admitted as a law-student at Lincoln's Inn; about two years later visited Ireland, where he remained for some time engaged in the management of his father's estates in that country; attended the preaching of Thomas Loe, an eminent Quaker minister (see supra) at Cork, and was greatly exercised by his uncompromising exhibition of religious duty; was carried, with other hearers, from the meeting-house to prison, from which he was released by the good offices of the Earl of Orrery; was recalled home by his father, bitterly reproached for his adherence to his religious principles, again refused to conform to worldly customs, even so far as to uncover to the king, the Duke of York, and Admiral Penn, and was again driven from his father's house; in 1668 first appeared as a minister among the Quakers, and in the same year published his Truth Exalted, and his Sandy Foundation Bhaken; was for the publication of the last-named treatise committed to the Tower, and employed a portion of his six or seven months' confinement in composing his principal production,—No Cross, No Crown; in 1869 was reconciled to his father, and resided about a twelvementh in Ireland, superintending his estates; in 1670-71 was twice committed to Newgate as an offender under the Conventicle Act: in 1670 lost his father, who left him estates worth £1500 a year, and, on his death-bed. interceded for his son, by application to the Duke of York; in 1672 married Guliolma Maria, daughter of Sir William Springett, and daughter-in-law of Isaac Pon-ington, (q. v.,) and took up his abode at Rickmansworth, Hostfordshire, but subsequently settled at Worminghuret, Sazzex; in 1677, accompanied by George Fox and Robert Barelay, made a religious tour in Holland and Germany, at which he published an account (Travels in Holland and Germany, anno 1677) in 1694; in 1680 accepted from the Crown, in lieu of £16,000 due to his father, the province of Pennsylvania, which he visited in 1682, and gain in 1699, remaining each time about two years; in 1688 and 1690 was four times arrested on suspicion of being a Jesuit and a plotter for the restoration of James IL in 1696 married his second wife, Haunah, the daugh rof Thomas Callowhill, a merchant of Bristol; in 1708, the of Thomas Callowhill, a merchant of Bristol; in 1708, paring become involved in pecuniary difficulties, mortgaged Pannsylvania for £0000, and in 1712 agreed to dispelse of his rights to the British government for £1,000,—but was prevented from concluding this transmetion by three apoptectic fits which impaired his intellect, find, at his ceat at Ruscombe, in Berkehire, July 30, 1715, unsured as an illustrious exemplar of Christian principle, philanthrupic seal, and unconquerable fortified in adherence to, the diotates of conscientious confliction ampuniting religious teath. His interest in his passationally province descended to his surviving sone of the last life, and was sold after the American Revoluas dirt stion to the State of Pennsylvania for 1384, 2007 Towns in the shoond year of his residence at Rassimos (Saray) he remained for the rest of his life that, as we have seen, his health experienced that shock which for the future incapacitated him for the transaction of business

But that life-pervading gentleness of disposition and kindness of heart which had so often been exerted to the strengthening of the weak and the comfort of the despond-ing—extorting even the unwilling admiration of bigoted intolerance and persecuting hate—still lent a charm to the infirmities of age, and even dignified the occasional wanderings of an unsettled mind. The traveller who was permitted to share the genial hospitality of the house of the patriarch, and to gaze upon him who had pever bowed the knee to aught save the Majosty of Heaven, must have been more or less than common man not to have been deeply moved in that presence. There would pass in rapid review before his mind the figure of the resolute boy, who, born to high estate, endowed with rare personal beauty, and tempted by all the allurements of a voluntuous and seductive court, voluntarily went forth an exile from his father's halls,—a dependant upon the bread of charity,-rather than disobey the monitions of an awakened conscience; of the voluntary immate of a felon's cell, who forgot the hardships of imprisonment in endoavouring to persuade all men to seek "that freedom wherewith Christ hath made them free," and to be wilting to endure a "Cross" which is but for a moment, for the sake of a "Crown" the glories of which shall know no fading; of a great ruler, whose happy genius had transformed a wilderness into the dwelling place of peace and plenty, and established a durable empire in the midst of warlike savages, by the sceptre of all-conquering love, by edicts of beneficence and proclamations of good will,

We say "a durable empire:" the suns of almost two centuries have risen and set upon the spot where the pacific lawgiver made his treaty with the red men of the forest; and to us it is permitted in the same place, now a prosperous city, enrolling within its population nearly balf a million of the descendants of Penn's countrymen, to offer our humble tribute to his virtues. Of him truly it may be said, "His works praise him in the gates." (Pirf-ladelphia, June, 1869.) But we were speaking of the gradual decline which presaged his approach to "the house of all living." There were sometimes affecting evidences, as the good man, surrounded by his children and those who claimed a spiritual relationship with the great apostle of their faith, waited in reverential silence for divine teachings, that he was favoured to "renew his strength," and to draw near to the ineffable Source of life and truth, whom he had long unfeignedly served, in adversity and in prosperity, in weakness and in vigour, in youth and in old age. Of such a solemn gathering we have a record transmitted by Thomas Story, who spent some time in the household in the year 1714.

spent some time in the household in the year 1714.

"That he had a clear sense of truth," remarks the narrator,
"was plain, by some very clear sentences he spoke in, the life and power of Truth, in an ovening meeting we had there, whorein we were greatly comforted, so that I am ready to think this was a sort of sequestration of him from all the concerns of this life which so much oppressed him; not in judgment, but in mercy, that he might not be oppressed thereby to the end."

"While visited by two of his friends in 1716," says another writer, "he still expressed himself sensibly, and, at parting, thus addressed them: 'My love is with you; the Lord preserve you, and remembor me in the overlasting covenant."

It had been more to the credit of human nature had more of the Proprietary's former "friends" retained their assiduous devotion to the benefactor, when the "time of giving" had passed away. The one who laid out his time and strength for many, found—as who in like circumstances has not found?—that he who outlives his prosperify outlives many "friendships." In the day of his influence in kings' palaces the services of no one seem to have been in kings palaces the services of no one seem to have been more in demand:

"William Penn," says Lord Macaulay, "was during the reign of Jaines the Second the most active and powerful solicitor about the Court. I will quote the words of his admirer Croces. 'Quain autem Pennus tagis gratis pluriaman spud regem valeret, et per id perplures sibi amicos acquireret, illum omnes, etiam qui modis aliqua notitia crant conjuncti, quoties aliquid a rege postulazidum agendumve apud regem esset, adire, ambire, orare, ut ege apud regem adjuvarot.' He was overwhelmed by bisiness of this kind, 'obcutus negotiationibus curationibusque.' His heuse and the approaches to it were every day blocked up by crowing of persons who came to request his good offices: 'domne se vestibula quotidis, referta cliertium et supplicantium.' From the Fountainhall papers it appears that his influence was fattiven in the highlands of Scott and. We learn from himself that it this time he was always to ring for others, that he was a said suitor at Whitehall, and that, if he had chosen to sell histories ence, he could, in little more than three years, have put a species.

Pennant, Thomas, LLD., 1726-1798, a native of Flintshire, educated at Queen's and Oriel Colleges, Oxford, became an extensive traveller at home and on the continent; and few have turned their observations to better account for themselves and the public. His first publications which appeared in print were an account of an earthquake felt at Downing, April 2, 1750, pub. in Phil. Trans., and a memoir on certain coralloid bodies, also pub. in Phil. Trans., 1755. The last-named article clicited the approbation of Linnaus, and by his recommendation the author was elected member of the Royal Society of Upsal. Thus encouraged in his literary proclivity, Pennant devoted himself to authorship with great zeal, and gave to the world a number of must valuable works in his favourite branches of research. Outlines of the Globe, 4 vols. 4to: L and li., 1798, contain The View of Hindostan; lil. and iv., 1800, edited by his son, David Pennant, con-tain The View of India extra Gangem, China, Japan, the Maluyan Islands, New Holland, and the Spice Islands. 20. A Journey from London to Dover and the Isle of Wight, 1801, 2 vols. r. 4to. 21. A Tour from Downing to Alston Moor, 1801, r. 4to. 22. A Tour from Alston Moor to Harrowgate and Brimham Crags, 1804, 4to. Pennant also printed several brochures at George Allan's Darlington Press, (see p. 52, ante; Rich's Bibl. Amer. Nova, i. 379, 43,) among which were a Catalogue of My Works (two leaves) and a History of the Patagonians, 1788, 4to,—reprinted, with other minor articles, in the Appendix to his Literary Life, 1793, 4to; and he contributed papers on subjects of natural history to Phil. Trans., 1763, 771, '81. Copies of most if not all of his works were taken off on large paper; and for particulars respecting these, and the prices at which his works have been sold, we refer the reader to Bohn's Lowndes, 1822—24; H. G. Bohn's Guines Cat., Nos. 20,055–20,130. Of Nos. 7, 8, 10, 20, 21, and 22, Stovenson remarks,

"These travels are written in a dry style; but they abound in securate descriptions of antiquities."—tut. of Voyages and Traints, No. 490.

But Pennant certainly has not generally the reputation of being a "dry writer:"

"Pennant's style of writing has always appeared to me the most desirable and satisfactory for a tourist author to adopt, as avoiding the dull monotony of a county history, and uniting, under the form of a journal, the pleasing ingredients of history, bography, and topography."—Siz R. C. Hourz.

"Wintever he touched he beautified, either by the elegance of his diction, the historic illustrations he introduced, or the popular charm he gave to things well known before."—Sw unsox.

"Qur own Pennant is always lively, full of vivacity and animation, and describes as well a young caterpillar as an old castle."—Backer, Mag. xxill. 872.

"Of his literary character the public is the impartial judge; and that public, not only in this but in foreign countries, has also do nit the stamp of approbation."—Duvid Pennant, (his son.) is See, also, Wheeldon, John, No. 1.

"Ponsant has greater unexpended."

Bos, also, Wheeldon, John, No. 1.

"Perhant has greater variety of inquiry than almost any similar, and has told us more perhaps than one in ten thousand shale have done in the time that he took,"—Dr. Jourson: Bossiel's Life.

This will perhaps remind the reader of the terrible satignation which Johnson gave Bishop Percy when the itter ventured the criticism,

And for a most amusing view of Pennant's burning a bilitary difficult wig, see Horace Walpole's Letters.

It will be remembered than it was to Pennant that Charles Cordinar addressed his Letters on the Antiquities and Scenery of the North of Scotland, 1780, 4to; and that it was to Pennant and Daines Barrington that Gilbert White wrote those charmtation under the title of The Natural History and Anti-quities of Selborne. Pennant assisted John Lightfoot. in his Flora Scotics, and praised his work when it appeared, (see p. 1090, ante;) nor let us omit to notice in this connection that Foster named a genus of plants in honour of our author,—Pennantia.

A more complete edition of the Diary is promised, (1868.) Candour compels us to state that Lord Braybrooke (d. 1858; see Lon. Gent. Mag., 1858, i. 639, and 1861, ii. 201) did not discharge his editorial dut'es in the most satisfactory manner. Lord Jessey, indeed, (Edin. Rev., xliii. 54,) commends his lordship's performance; but Sir Walter Scott (Lon. Quar. Rev., xxxiii. 261) records a less favourable verdict. Many of his errors were pointed out in a series of papers in the Lordon Athenæum, (review of the 3d ed., 1848–49,) 1848, 549, 570, 669, 699, 902, 1293, 1322; 1849, 807. "If, quitting the broad path of history, we seek for minute information concerning ancient manners and customs, the progress of arts and sciences, and the various branches of antiquity, we have never seen so rich a mine as the volumes before us. ties. For society he had as little inclination: he pro-bably had but little hope of increasing his knewledge by miscelleneous intercourse; and he had no desire to dis-play the acquisitions already made. He was never so happy as when, with a book in his library, or the geologist's hammer in his hand, he sought to add to his large stores of information respecting man and his dwellingplace.

"It is pleasant to see the Poems of Percival in a collected shape, printed, bound, and published in a style worthy of their merit and his memory. The 'New England,' 'Coral dirove,' 'Senoca Lake,' and other popular lyrics of 'Percival have endeared his muse to more than one generation; but the cultivated and sympathetic reader, upon examining these two 'blue and gold' volumes just published by Ticknor & Fields, will find a love of nature as scientific as it is ideal, an invention ir. metrical skill as rare as it is attractive, a tonderness and reflection, a classical discipline and an American tone, a copions, versatile, eloquent fancy, language, and sentiment, which will gain a critical rank for Percival which, to those unfamiliar with his collected writings, will prove an agreeable surprise. The memoir and portrait add to the value and interest of the volumes."—II. T. Tuckerman. -H. T. TUCKERMAN.

The vols. were reviewed in N. Amer. Rev., July, 1860, 72, by Rev. J. H. Ward.
We are pleased to observe by a note in vol. i. that "It is proposed at some future time to publish a volume of Percival's translations uniform with this edition of his Poems."

Percival translated from many tongues:

"He reads with fluency," wrote one in his lifetime, "ten languages, and is so familiar with the Lattu, Greek, French, Spanish, German, and Italian, that he can take a work never before seen by him, in any of those languages, and read it with as much correctness and ease as he would one of his own poems."

This is, of course, absurdly exaggerated: nothing short of inspiration can transmute in this fashion. But much less than this would be high praise; and Percival's linguistic attainments were certainly not of an every-day character. To a knowledge of the Greek, Latin, Sanskritz arench, Italian, Spanish, and Basque, he added a large acquaintance with the poetry of the Sclavonio tungues, and that of the Gaelic, Welsh, Norse, Danish, and Swedish. Of the "concord of sweet sounds" he was an enthusiastic admirer, and the genius of language was by his paternal agency constituted one of "the daughters by his paterian agency constituted one of "the dauguers of Music," by an adoption at once pleasing and remarkable.

"It was one of his favourite plans," we are told by his bloggrapher, "to imitate in English all known metres in all accessible languages from the Sanskrit downwards. He told me that he had versified in thirteen languages; and I have heard from others that he had imitated all the Greek and German motres."—Per-

After the publication of the article from which we have just quoted, its accomplished author, Prof. C. U.

Shepard, (unte.) thus wrote us:

"I have lately heard one other circumstance connected with Percival's self-culture, which may interest you. He was at the pains to write out a translation [ist own] of fluoner, solely with a view to the improvement of his style."—To S. Austin Allibone:

Of the daystion with which he ministered at the alternative of the style."

Of the devotion with which he ministered at the altar of Euterpe we have a graphic account by Mr. Richard S. Willis, of the Musical World, quoted in the Biographical Sketch prefixed to Percival's Poetical Works, ed. 1859. But neither Philology, Poetry, nor Music—each a proverbially jealous mistress—was permitted to debar the student from extensive excursions into departments of research apparently the least connected with those just recited, and with each other. Like the great lord chancellor and greater philosopher, Pereival had at an early age "taken all knowledge for his province." fore he had attained his twenty-eighth year, a well-known critic testifies of him,

The treasures of various learning, thus early acquired,

The treasures of various learning, thus early acquired, reactived constant accessions through life, and presented at its close an aggregate of wealth to which the glowing enlogy of one of the best of American living scholars has done no more than justice. (See George Ticknor's letter, 1858, in Biog. Sketch in Percival's Poetical Works, ed. 1859, xiiv.)

Motwithstanding the frequent terrors of the resembles done, he managed, by a diligent use of opportunities, to accumulate a remarkable collection of books.

more than 10,000 in number. These were offered, masse, by his executor, for $36,000, but finally were moved from their curious-looking receptacle on Early Place, below George Street, New Havan, and sold by Messes. Leonard & Co., at Boston, in April, 1860.

To consider him as a poet: exactly one year before Dr. Gilman penned the lines which we have just cited, Edward Everett reviewed Percival's first volume of Poems. (1821, 12mo, p. 346.) in the North American Review, and, whilst qualifying frankly expressed admonition with artical counsel, still awards to the author the high praise of presenting the public with a volume which "contains the marks of an inspiration more lefty and genuine than any similar collection of fugitive pieces which has some to our notice from a native bard,"—Jan. 1822, 1-16.

The London Monthly Review, whilst strongly condemnating what we suppose neither Percival nor any of his judicious friends would have fult easy to justify,startling and terrific pictures of a powerful but fevered imagination, of contempt and hatred of mankind, &c., which disfigure some of the pages of his first collection,"—characterizes Prometheus as "abounding in splendid. and fanciful passages," and, after citing long extracts as evidence of this assertion, remarks,

"If the muse of the New World continues to rank among her votaries poets who can produce lines equal and superior to the proceeding, she will not long have to repine at the fame of those of older nations."—July, 1824, 315—321.

Early in the next year, John Neal, who at that time was wont, through the columns of transatlantic periodicals, to astonish "American Writers" with the intimate knowledge of their literary life displayed (as they thought) by English critics, and who, we are glad to say, still lives to laugh at our quotations from the luqusay, still lives to laugh at our quotations from the luquirations of his adolescentia, thus discourses of Pereival's "Among poets, very much what Geopper Crayon is among prose writers; calm, gentle, steady, and beautiful; an inditate! of Byron,—so successfully, too, in his Promeries that stering after stones would pass for Byron's if they appeared in a collection of his poetry. The best of Dr. P.'s workmanship, however, is to be found in his little pieces, many of which are very benutful, pure, sweet poetry without being wonderful or great."—American Writers, No. V.: Blacker, Mag., Feb. 1825, 195.

In another review of the writers of America, by the rule of Horsee, posts was all the first poet of America, by the rule of Horsee, posts was citur non Al, is James G. Percival. He was born one. He would have been a poet under any circumstances,—born anywhere, bred in any nanner. He has not written any one thing equal to the 'Evening Wind' of Bryant, but his birthright lies a thousand leagues higher no Parassus. Percival is the most interest. leagues higher up Parnassus. Percival is the most interesting man in America. Had he been born in any country of Europe, he would have had fame and fortune thrust upon him, which he wants the confidence to pluck down upon himself,"—Literature of the Nineteenth Century,—America: Lon. Athen., 1836, 64, 55.

Percival's and Bryant's names will also be found in conjunction, though not in the way of contrast, in the Edinburgh Review for April, 1835, 34; Selections from the American Poets, Dublin, 1834, 8vo. Dr. Gliman had said, long before, that "the admirers of Mr. Bryant might; find cause of jealousy" in Percival's Self-Devotlon to Solitary Studies Accounted For, and the Prevalence of Poetry; and remarked-referring to Percival's poetry

published before 1823-that

"The places are not a few, in which the soul of the author, rising as he proceeds, involves itself and the reader in a cloud of delicious enchantment. He possenses the rare and divise art of imparting to language those mysterious and uncarthly influences which come to us from the strings of an Æolian harp."—

Much to the same effect is the verdict of a very eminent

American critic:

American critic:

"The glow and sparkle of Percival's verse are often in the highest degree inspiring. The swell and sweep in his diction correspond with the turbulence and joy of soul from which much of his poetry seems to gush. The mind of the reader is hurried along the stream of his verse, and readily adopts his changing moods. 'The Prevalence of Poetry, 'Consumption,' 'Clouds,' 'Moraing among the Hills,' 'Gheins Simphering,' 'Genius Wake, ing,' 'The Sun,' and 'New England, 'are all excellent, and evince his artistical ability and the range of his genius. We say artistical ability and the range of his genius. We say artistical ability. He writer than is directly expressed, but the sun of Percival's poems indicate. Edwir P. Weitpris. 'N. Amer. Dr. Johnson, we have seen, (see PENNANT, THOMAS,) quarrelled with Percy; but it was a fortunate pass at arms for the latter, inasmuch as Johnson's repentance signalized itself in the glowing eulogy on his late for recorded in Boswell's lxiii. chapter:

"A man out of whose company I never go without having learned something. I am sure that he vexes me sometimes, but I am afraid it is by making me feel my own ignorance. So much extension of mind, and so much minute accuracy of inquiry, if you survey your whole circle of acquaintance, you will fail so scarce, if you find at all, that you will value Percy by comparison. . . Porcy's attention to postry has given grace and splendight to his studies of antiquity."—Letter to Bosnell, April 23, 1778.

Rev., Oct. 1859, Dr. Johnson, we have seen, (see PENNANT, THOMAS,) quarrelled with Percy; but it was a fortunate pass at arms for the latter, inasmuch as Johnson's repentance signalized itself in the glowing eulogy on his late foe resorded in Boswell's lxiii. chapter:

"A man out of whose company I nover go without having learned something. I am sure that he voxes me sometimes, but I am afraid it is by making me feel my own ignorance. So much extension of mind, and so much minute accuracy of inquiry, if you survey your whole circle of acquaintance, you will faid so exarce, if you find at all, that you will value Percy by comparison. . . . Percy's attention to poetry has given grace and splendour to his studies of antiquity."—Letter to Bowell, April 22, 1778.

Perkins, William, 1558-1602, a learned Calvinist

Perkins, William, 1558-1662, a learned Calvinist divine, a native of Warton, Warwickshire, educated at, and Fellow and Tutor of, Christ College, Cambridge, first preached to the prisoners in Cambridge, jail, and afterwards officiated as preacher of St. Andrew's Church, Cambridge. He was the author of Expositions of the Creed; of the Lord's Prayer; of chep. i.—v. (completed by Rodolfe Cudworthe) of the Epistle to the Galatiana; of St. Matthew v.—vii.; of Romans i.—iii.; Commentarie on Heb. xi.; Cases of Conscience; and many doctrinal practical, and controversial treatises. Several of his works were trans. into Latin, French, Dutch, and Spanish; and their popularity at home is evinced by the number of collective edits. of them, each in 3 vols. St. issued shortly after his death, between 1605 and 1681

It is not a little remarkable that, in this day of the exhumation of so much buried theology, Perkins's works have not been republished. Yet few writers have been more commended.

theology, Perkins's works have not been republished. Yet few writers have been more commended.

"Porkins's sermons were all law and all gospel; a rare instance of those opposite gifts meeting in so eminent a degree in the same preacher. Even the vehemence and thunder of Boanerges to awaken sinners to a sense of their sin and danger, and to drive them from destruction; and the persuasion and comfort of Barnabas to pour the oil and wine of gospel consolation into their wounded spirits. Bishop Mentagu preached his funeral sermon, and spoke in high commendation of his learning, piety, and laboura."—Brook's Lives of the Puritians.

"He excelled in a distinct judgment, a rare dexterity in clearing the obscure subtleties of the echools, and in an easy explication of the most perplexed subjects."—Bissop Hatt.

"The Works of Perkins are distinguished for their piety, learning, extensive knowledge of the Neriptures, and strong Calvinistic argumentation. . . The works of Perkins were highly esteemed by Job Orton, though far from being a thorough Calvinistic argumentation. . . . His style is highly Calvinistic; but he carried the idea of reprobation too far. . . . His Commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians is equally sound as Luther's, but more methodical and comprehensive."—Dr. E. Williams's C. P., ed. 1843, 293, 303.

"His works have been too nuch undervalued: learned, spiritual, Calvinistic, and practical; . . . holy and evangelleal."

Peter of Blois, (Petrus Blesensis,) so called from the place of his birth, d. about 1200 in England, studied at Tours, Paris, and Boulogne, was invited to England by Henry II., and became Archdencon of Bath, Chancellor of Canterbury, and Archdescon of London. He came to England probably about 1170, and until the death of this monarch, in 1189, enjoyed great influence in affairs of Church and State; but he was no favourite with Henry's successor, Richard I., and in a letter (Epist. CXLIX.) to his friends at the new court he draws an affecting contrast between his present and former position. From 1191 to 1195 he no doubt found a melancholy satisfaction in the duties of secretary to Queen Eleanor, the widow of his great patron. He is supposed to have died soon after 1198. He was the author of to have died soon after 198. Peters, Charles, M.D. Of a Person Bitten by a Mad Dog; Phil. Trans., 1745. Cured.

Peters, Charles, a native of Cornwall; educated at Exeter College, Oxford; obtained the living of Boco-noc; became Rector of St. Mabyn, 1727, in his native county, and d. there in 1777. 1. A Critical Dissertation on the Book of Job, Lon., 1751, 4to: 2d cd., with Preface, 1757, 8vo; Appendix, 1760, 8vo, pp. 63. The first ed. was reviewed in Lon. Month. Rev., April, 1751, 401-408. See No. 2. Although the work was simed chiefly against Warburton's Divine Legation, Dr. (afterwards Bishop) Lowth "makes honourable mention of it" in a letter to Warburton.

"The author particularly considers Bishop Warburton's ac-count of the Book of Job, vindicates its antiquity, and shews that the ancient Jews did believe in a future state."—Horne's Juld. Bib.

"It is not a regular reply to Warburton's Legation, nor indeed is it principally devoted to it. It contains a large portion of critical learning, and throws much light on all the subjects which it investigates. . . . It is altogether a valuable book."—

Peters, Hugh, 1599-1660, a native of Fowey, Cornwall; educated at Jesus College and Trinity College, Cambridge; after treading the boards as a comedian, took holy orders in the Church of England, and officiated for some time as Lecturer of Saint Sepulchre's London, From want of conformity to the requisitions of the Law or the precepts of the Gospel, he was involved in trouble which caused him to fly to Rotterdam, where he became co-pastor with the Rev. Dr. William Ames; and in this station, as in his London pastorate, he seems to have used his powerful eloquence and pulpit eccentricities with great effect. In 1835 he emigrated to America; on Dec. 21, 1636, was settled as Paster of the First Church at Salem, Massachusetts; in 1637 he was elected an overseer of Harvard College; in March, 1638, he was appointed by the General Court to assist in collecting and revising the Colonial Laws: in 1640 he associated Edward Norris with bim in the pastorate of his church; Aug. 3, 1641, he sailed for Eugland in company with Rev. Thomas Welde and William Hibbins, the three being deputed to represent to the Home Government "the sense of the colony upon the laws of excise and trade;" arrived at London, he took an active part in the opposition to Charles L, for which, at the Restoration, he was hanged and quartered, He was the author of Good Work for a Good Magistrate, Lon., 1651, 12mo, (in which he recommends the burning of the historical records in the Tower;) a Dying Father's Last Legacy to an Only Child, 1660, 8vo, 1717; and a number of political tracts, occasional sermons, &c. He also pub. Amesii Lectiones in Psalmos; cum Epist. Dedic. 1647, 8vo, (see p. 58, ante.) Concerning the character of Peters the most opposite opinions have prevailed. Judge Peters published many papers in the Memoirs of the Philadelphia Agricultural Society, of which he was President. To him we are indebted for the introduction of the use of gypsum in agriculture. He put forth a pamphlet on this subject as early as 1797. On the for-mation of the new Constitution, President Washington offered him the post of Comptroller of the Treasury of the United States; but the judgeship was preferred by alta. He died on the same spot where he was born stighty-four years before,—the country-seat at Belmont, inherited by him from his father. See An Address on the Doath of the Hon. Philips, John, 1678-1709, a native of Bampton, Oxfordshire, of which place his father, Stephen Philips, D. A. Arbelston, of S. Marian and S. Marian. D.D., Archdercon of Salop, was minister, was entered at Christ Chuich, Oxford, in 1694, pub a poem in Memory thrist Chuich, Oxford, in 1694, pub a poem in Memory of Queen Anne in 1695, fol, contributed his Splendid Shilling a mock heroic poem in imitation of the verse of Piradise Lost, to a Collection of Poems printed in 1701, 810, pub. Blenheim, a Poem, in 1705, fol, and gave to the world in 1708, 5vo, his principal production,—Cyder; a Poem, in 1708 Books. He also pub. an excellent Latin other Children Childre ode-Ode ad Heuricum St. John, Armig., 12mo-dedicated to his patron, Lord Bolingbroke, in return for a present of wine and tobacco. Philips meditated, but, perhaps tortunately for his fame, did not live to finish, a poem on The Last Day,—"a subject," to quote the words of Dr Johnson, "on which, no mind can hope to equal expectation." Of The Splendid Shilling an imperfect shit was pub., separately, in 1703, 12mo, and another in 1703, a correct edition, in folio, was also issued in 1765;

another edit. appeared in 1719, 12mo. A new edit. of Blenheim was pub. in 1719, 12mo; and an excellent im-pression of Cyder, with Notes, Provincial and Historical, by Charles Dunster, Svo, gratified the admirers of Philips in 1791. In 1762, 12mo, speared a collective edit. of his pieces, under the title of Poems attempted in the Style of Milton, by Mr. John Philips, with a new Account of his life and writings. In his now ed. of Johnson's Lives of the Most Emment English Poets, 1854, 3 vols. 8vo. Mr. P. Cunningham has added to the Life of Philips a Fragment, written by Edmund Smith, upon the Works of Philips,-translated from the Bodleian Manuscripts. See, also, the Life of Philips in the Biographia Britannica.

The pertinacity with which Philips followed up his attempted imitation of Paradise Lost—for he essays it in Blenheim and in Cyder, as well as in The Splendid Shilling—argues a radical defect of good taste for which much greater genius would hardly be accepted as an

"Philips," says a great contemporaneous master of criticism,
"has succeeded extremely well in his imitation of 'Paradise and in Blenheim, Dr. Johnson remarks,

"To degrade the sounding words and stately construction of Milton by an application (in The Splendid Shifting) to the lowest and most trivial things, gratifies the mind with a momentary triumph over that grandeur which intherto held its captives in admiration. The words and things are presented with a new appearance; and novely is always grateful where it gives no pain. But the ment of such performances begins and ends with the first author. . . . [In Blenheim] He instates Milton's numbers indeed, but initiates them very injudiciously. Deformity is easily cepted; and whatever there is in Milton which the reader wishes away, all that is obsolete, peculiar, or incentious, is accuwishes away, all that is obsolete, peculiar, or incentious, is accueasily copied; and whatever there is in Milton which the reader wishes away, all that is obsolete, peculiar, or hearings is accomulated with great care by Philips. These asperities, therefore, that are venerable in the 'Paradise Lost' are contemptible in the 'Blenhoin,''."—Life of Milips.

"One excellence of The Splendid Shilling is that it is short. Disgues can gratify no longer than it deceives."—Dr. Jonson: Lafe of Somerville.

Tested by its own merits, the verdict of criticism on

Tested by its own merits, the verdict of criticism on Philips's principal poem has been highly favourable.

"To the poem on Cider," remarks Johnson, "written in initation of the Georgics, may be given this peculiar praise, that it is grounded in truth, that the precepts which it contains accessed and just, and that it is, therefore, at once a book of entertainment and of science. This I was told by [Philip] Miller, the great gardener and botanist, whose expression was that there were many books weithen on the same subject in prose which do not contain so much truth as that poem. . . . What study could confer, Philips had obtained; but matural deficience cannot be supplied. He seems not boin to greatness and clevation. He is never lotty, nor does be often surprise with unexpected excellence; but perhaps to his last poem may be applied what Tully said of the work of Lucretius, that it is written with much art, though with froe blazes of genius."—Life of Philips.

"The fame of this poet (says the grave doctor of the last century) will endure as long as Helmiem is remembered or cider drunk in England. He might have added, as long as tobacco shall be snoked; for Philips has written more meritoriously about the Indian weed than about his native apple; and his Muse appears to be more in her element amidst the smoke of the pipe than of the battle."—Campbell's Specimens.

It is a curious fact that the poet celebrates the virtues of tobacco in all his poems save Blenheim. A brief criticism upon Blenheim by Lord Macaulay, who with great felicity styles Philips "the poet of the English vintage," (Essays, iii. 488.) will be found in his Lordship's Critical and Historical Essays, ed. 1854, iii. 386-387. The critic thus concludes his admonttion:

"If he learns to think of his subject; to regard the sense always, even in ornamental passages; to speak plainly and retonally; to use figures only when they come naturally in, and then to use them as not abusing them—we will venture to promise him very considerable success in the ardnous pursuit of oratorical renown."—p. 70.

A meagre biographical notice of Mr. Phillips appeared in Lon. Gent. Mag., 1859, i. 434, (Obituary.)

Mr. Phillips was severely censured for his course in the course of the course defence of Courvolsier, the Swiss valet who murdered his sleeping master, Lord William Russell, in Norfolk Street, Park Lane, in May, 1840. The censure was revived in the Examiner newspaper in November, 1849, and Mr. Samuel Warren suggested to Mr. Phillips the propriety of his contradicting what Mr. W. believed to be erroneous assertions. This suggestion led to the publication in the London Times of Nov. 20th, 1849, of two letters on the subject between Mr. Warren and Mr. Phillips: see Correspondence between Samuel Warren, Esq., and Charles Phillips, Esq., relative to the Trial of Courvoisier, with Preface and Appendix, 1849, 8vo. rantips's remarkable style of oratory Sir James Mackintosh, as may readily be supposed, was no admirer.

"Plunket," he remarked to Alexander II. Everett, "if he had come earlier into Parliament, so as to have learned the trade, would probably have excelled all our orators. He and Comsellor Phillips (or O'Charnish, as he is nicknamed here) are at the opposite points of the scale. O'Charnish's style is plifful to the last degree. He ought by common consent to be driven from the bar."—N. Amer. Rev., Oct. 1832, 148, n.

in his anger and in his sport, has better things to say of Phillips; and one or two of these things we present to the reader:

the reader:

"Charles Phillips was worth a gross of Sheils. There were frequent flashes of fine imagination, and strains of genuine feeling, in his speeches, that showed Nature intended him for an orator. In the midst of his most redious and tasteless exaggerations, you still feel that Charles Phillips had a heart," &c.—Noctes Ambros., Dec. 1828: Blackw. Mag., xxiv. 703. "Sir Richard Phillips had four valuable qualities: honesty seal, ability, and courage. He applied them all to teachin matters about which he knew nothing, and gained himself a uncomfortable life and a ridiculous memory."—Provessos Dr

Philips, Richard, 1778-1851; President of the Chemical Society of London, and first Curator and Chemist of the Museum of Practical Geology; younger brother of William Phillips, the mineralogist, (infra;) gained great and merited distinction by his contributions to analytical chemistry. He was Lecturer on Chemistry at the London Hospital, at St. Thomas's Hospital, and at other institutions. From 1821 to 1827 he conducted (with the assistance of E. W. Brayley, Jun.) the Annals of Philosophy; from 1827 until his death was one of the editors of the Philosophical Magazine, (contributing papers to both of these periodicals:) wrote the principal articles on mineralogy and chemistry for the Penny Cyclopredia, and published the results of some of his scientific investigations in the Transactions of the Royal Bosiety. See English Cyc., Biog., iv., 1857, 807-808; Lon. Gent. Mag., Aug. 1851, 208; Dr. Thomson's Hist. of Chemistry. In 1811 he pub. An Examination of the or Comistry. In 1811 no pub. Phillips, Willard, b. Dec. 19, 1781, at East Bridge-water, co. of Plymouth, Muss.; graduated at Harvard Colloge, 1810; was subsequently engaged for one year as assistant in a private academy in Boston; Tutor at Harvard College,—first in Latin and afterwards in Arithmetic and Natural Philosophy,—1811-15; studied law with William Sullivan; was admitted to the bar, and rose to eminence in his profession. In addition to the discharge of his duties as Judge of Probate of Suffolk county, Mr. Phillips was employed for a number of years, (1837-41, &c.,) under a legislative commission to himself and others, in reducing the law of crimes and punishments to a systematic code. The result of these labours was reported by Mr. Phillips and Mr. Samuel B. Walcot to the Legislature of Massachusetts, but has not been adopted by that body. The work, however, has had a anopted by that body. The work, however, has had a material influence on legislation and the administration of the criminal law. In 1812 Mr. Phillips was a contributor to the General Repository and Review, (see PAINE, ROBBET TREAT,) had the oversight of the North American Review (Mr. Tudor continuing his editorial labours) during the second year of its existence, and was one of the North American Club, under whose charge it fell in 1817; contributed to the pages of this periodi-cal from its commencement until the year 1834; for Some years published and edited the American Jurist; during the war of 1812-14 pub. an Appeal to the Public Spirit of the Federalists and the Good Sense of the Democrats,—designed to promote the war spirit in New England; pub. in 1833, Hoston, 8vo, A Treatise on Ave-rages and Adjustments of Losses in Marine Insurance; with Notes made up from the works of Stevens and Benecke; in conjunction with Edward Pickering, edited, in 1834-39, 1st and 2d Amer. edits. of Collyer on the law of Partnership, (see p. 414, ante,) and the first eight vols. of Pickering's Reports, 1824, &c. Picken, Andrew, 1788-1833, a native of Paisley Scotland, after a short residence in the West Indies, and some experience as a clerk in the Bank of Ireland, a merchant in Chagow, and a bookseller in Liverpool, about 1827 established himself as a professional author in London, and there remained until his death. His publications are the following: 1. Tales and Sketches of the West of Glasgow. In this vol., some satirical portraits in which gave great offence, first appeared the pathetic story of Mary Ogilvic, repub., Lon., 12mo. See No. tio story of Mary Ogilvic, repub., Lon., 12mo. Pickering, Charles, M.D., b. Nov. 10, 1805, on the North Branch of the Susquehanna, in Ponna, a grand-son of Col. Timothy Pickering of the Revolution, and nephew of John and Octavius Pickering, (all of whom appear in this Dictionary,) was educated at Harvard University, and graduated M.D. at Boston Medical College, after which he removed to Philadelphia. A year or two later he contributed to Trans. Amer. Phil. Soc., vol. iii., N. S., a paper on the Geographical Distribution of Plants, a subject which he has since pursued with great zeal and emluent success. For eleven years he was an active member of the Acad. of Natural Sciences of Phila.,-still engaged in the practice of medicine,-and at the expiration of this period was appointed a mem-ber of the Scientific Corps of the U.S. Exploring Expe-dition. This Expedition returned leaving certain coun-Tries that required to be visited to complete the survey of the globe. Accordingly, after remaining a little over a year at Washington, he set out alone in 1843 for Malta, Egypt, down the Red Sea to Zanzibar in East Africa, and thence to Bombay, returning after an absence of twenty-two months. He then prepared and published his work entitled The Races of Man and their (leographical Distribution, forming vol. ix. of the U.N. Exploring Expedition, Bost., 1848, 4to, pp. vii., 447, and 12; illustrated. It has also been republished in London in Bohn's Illustrated Library, edited by John Henry Hall, M.D., 1850, sq. 12mo. While finishing this work, he 1850, sq. 12mo. While finishing this work, he "made a discovery in Chronology"—we quote Mr. Pickering's words—"in regard to the length and the successive eras of the ending of the 'Great Year,' the Period of Time counted by a calendar year of 365 days. The Egyptians adhered to such a calendar for some 4000 years, and the result is: that the date of every event in Egyptian history has been preserved, and can be recovered; that the date of every event monitoned is the Bible, up to and beyond the days of Abraham, can be equally recovered by means of the Egyptian Great Year; and the same holds true in regard to the carlier events of Greek and Roman history. The announcement and explanation of this discovery were given as 'Chronological Observations,'—the first portion of a supplementary improved Chapter of the Races of Man.'

This supplementary chapter,—The Geographical Distribution of Animals and Man,—forming the 15th vol. of the U.S. Exploring Expedition, was pub., Boston, 1854, 4to, pp. 214. Of the Chronological Observations the Westminster Review remarks,

"The proper execution of such a work implies not only great knowledge of natural history, but very extensive erudition,— qualities of whose combination abundant evidence will be found in Dr. Pickering's very valuable cessay. We look forward with anxiety to the more general work which it heralds."—July, 1864. -July, 1854. Another English writer styles Pickering's Races of Man

"The best account of the Malay, Mongolian, Papuan, Negrillo, Negro, Telingan, Ethiopian, Abyssinian, and Arabaan races, hitherto published, with valuable Essays on the Migrations by Sea, the Natural History of Polynesia, India, Egypt, &c."

See, also, Emerson's English Traits, Lon., 1857, 25.

In 1858 Dr. Pickering communicated to the American Oriental Society an essay on the Invention of the Art of Writing, and in the same year read some notes (since printed) before the Boston Natural Society on The Stinging Power of the Physalia. Dr. Pickering meditates a most important work,—nothing less than "an intelligible account of the Human Family from its earliest traces, downwards in the grand procession of mortality to the present day;" and this, we trust, will not be long with-held from the world.

Timothy Pickering of the Revolution, and a "native of Salem, Mass., graduated at Harvard University in 1796; Secretary of Legation to Portugal, 1797; private Secretary to Rufus King, U.S. Minister at London, 1799-1801; returned to Salem, 1801, and subsequently commenced the practice of the law, in which he continued at this place until 1829, when he removed to Roston where he place until 1829, when he removed to Boston, where he was appointed City Solicitor, and held the office till within a short time of his death. In 1806 he was elected Hancock Professor of Robrew and other Oriental Lan-guages in Harvard University, and at a later day was invited to fill the chair of Greek Literature in the same institution: both these positions he declined. He was thrice Representative from Salem, twice a Senator from Resex, once a Senator from Suffolk, once a member of the Executive Council, and in 1833 a member of the Commission (in which he did good service) for revising and arranging the Statutes of Massachusetts. His best-known publications are the following: 1. "I wish Mr. Pickering would make a radical lexicon. It would do more than any thing clse, in the present state of the matter, to promote the study of Greek among us."—Tuomas Jeyfenson: Conversation with Daniel Webster, Dec. 1824: Webster's Private Correspondence, i. 373.

This is a work of the highest value. We have before us commendations of it by Drs. Edward Robinson, Peter Bullions, S. H. Taylor, (in Bibliotheca Sacra, iv. 196,) Prof. J. J. Owen, Prof. Felton, (in the Christian Examinotices in N. Amer. Rev., li. 487, (by J. G. Palfrey, D.D.;)

essay on the Pronunciation of the Greek Language, in Mem. A. A. S., vol. iv.; Moore, Nathaniel F., Ll.D., No. 1. Immediately on the publication of the 1st ed. of Pickering's Lexicon (based upon that of Schrevelius) it was repub. in Edinburgh, by E. H. Barker and Prof. George Dunbar, with additions and corrections. In the 1st Edin. ed. credit was given to the American editor, but in the 2d ed. the acknowledgment was omitted, and that the work ran through several foreign edits, and the American publishers found it to their interest to import 500 copies to supply the demand for it at home. But the 3d ed. of Pickering's Lexicon is indeed a new work, having been enlarged from 900 pp. to 1456 pp., and embodying the results of Dr. P.'s late extensive researches in classical and Oriental literature. This is a collection of his poems, including the Hymns to the Gods, originally pub. in 1831, were repub., with additions, in Blackwood's Magazine (xlv. 819-830) for June, 1839. Professor Wilson appends to them a complimentary notice, declaring

"These fine Hymns entitle their author to take his place in the highest order of his country's poets,"
"A series of Hymns to the Gods, after the manner of Keats, which have justly commanded favourable notice."—H. T. Tuckerman's Sketch of Amer. Lit., 1852.
"Here was also published the earnest poetry of Albert Pike, breathing the true spirit of old mythology."—Dr. R. S. MAGEREISE: Hist, of Blackse. Mag., Nooles Ambres, 1852, Lyvii.

The Ode to the Mocking-Bird, originally pub. in Philadelphia about 1836, was repub. in Blackwood's Mag. (xlvii. 354-355) for March, 1840. Ariel, another of Mr. Pike's best-known poems, appeared in a short-lived periodical, pub. in Boston, in 1834 or 1835. It was wratten in the prairie while the poot's horse was feeding by his side. About the same time (1835) he published an Indian romance, "illustrative of the habits of the Camanche and Navajo Indians, and of Mexican life at an early period of the incursions by the Spaniards." In 1859 he published The Statutes and Regulations, Institutes, Laws, and Grand Constitutions of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite; Compiled, with Notes, from Authentic Documents for the Use of the Order, [French and English,] by Albert Pike, 33rd M.P., Sovereign Grand Commander of the Supreme Council for the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States, N. York, Svo. pp. 168.

Of his unpublished poems, the principal of which were written between 1831 and 1840, Los Tiempos is the lengest. Of his minor poetical pieces which have found their way to the press, the best-known, after the Hymns to the Gods and the Ode to the Mocking-Bird, are Lines Written on the Rocky Mountains, To Spring, and To the Planet Jupiter. The death of Col. Albert James Pickett, (supra.) in Dec. 1858, led to a report of the demise of Col. Albert Pike, and the latter enjoyed the rare felicityan advance of good fortune beyond even the "happy opportunity of death" coveted by the ancients—of perusing glowing epicedian tributes to his own "departed worth." In the next month the appearance at Washington City in life and health of the "deeply lamented" was celebrated by a social festival, the incidents of which have been duly recorded in an exquisite volume (privately printed in August, 1859) entitled The Life-Wake of the Line Arkansas Gentleman who Died before his Time. To the above we have now to add that in Feb. 1867, Mr. Pike became editor of the Memphis Appeal, and left it in 1868.

Pinkerton, John, 1758-1826, a native of Edinburgh, was for six years a scholar at the Lanark Grammar-School, and subsequently served a five years' apprenticeship in the office of Mr. Aytoun, a writer to the Signet. He pub. in 1776 an Ode to Craigmillar Castle, and on the death of his father, in 1780, came to London and commenced author by profession. From 1802 to and commenced author by profession. From 2002 to 1805 he resided in Paris, spent in that city, often in narrow circumstances, the principal part of his later years, and was there "gathered to his fathers." He was a man of considerable learning, more pedantry, great pretension, and little patience under opposition. His publications appeared as follows: 1. Rimes, Lon., 1781, 8vo; 2d ed., 1782, Svo.

"There is great poetic beauty and merit in them, with great knowledge of the ancient masters and of the best of the modern."

-Horace Walpole to Pinkertm, Aug. 24, 1784.

2. Scottish Tragic Ballads, 1781, 8vo; 2d ed., with a second part, containing Ballads of the Comic Kind, the second part, containing Ballads of the Comic Kind, the whole being included under the title of Select Scottish Ballads, 1783, 2 vols. 8vo. Several of those were the productions of Pinkerton's own pen: see his confession in his Ancient Scottish Poems, No. 7, post. See, also, Sir W. Scott's Introduc. Illust., viii. 1858, 99, 108-112; Lon. Athen., 1860, I. 516. The critical canons and orthographical innova-tions of these Letters, it will be seen, elicited vigorous protests.

"That monster Pinkerton proposed a revolution which would have left us nothing to spell."—De Quincer: see Lon. Render, 1864, I. 371, (Notes on some English Heterographers, by Henry

B. Wheatley.)

The author himself subsequently characterizes it as "a book written in early youth, and contained many invente erude ideas long since abandoned by its author."—Walpoliana,

The book, however, introduced Pinkerton to Horace Walpole, (see his Letters, ed. 1861.) Gibbon, and other men of letters and fashion. 6. (edited by Mr. Harwood) was criticised by Barré Charles Roberts, (the article was repub. in his Letters, &c., 1814, r. 4to,) in Lon. Quar. Rev., i. 112.

"This work, though deformed by the dogmatism and self-con-cast of the author, is one of the most useful publications on the subject of which it treats."—McCulloch's Lit. of Polit. Econ., 1845,

On the other hand, the London Quarterly Review calls Pinkerton "a mere dabbler in geography," and many pages of the Edinburgh Review (Oct. 1803, 76-80, April, 1807, 154-171) are occupied with notices of errors in the 1st and 2d editions. The last-named periodical, however, (April, 1803, 67-76,) finds much to commend in Mr. Pinkerton's performance. We may here properly state that the last English ed. of Malte-Brun and Baibi's System of Universal Geography was pub. by H. G. Bohn, Lon., 1859, 8vo, pp. 1071, 15s. It has an index of 13,500 names. "All the travals, worthy of preservation, contained in the former large collections of Churchill, Green, Harris, and the Harleian, are here reprinted. Many volumes of high price, such as Pococke's and Shawe's Travels, are given almost entire. Translations and extracts of many important travels, not before known in the English language, are likewise intermingled; besides several small treatises, objects of research among the curious, and exceedingly scarce. In this point of view, it is believed that the purchaser of this work could not procure the same collection in the originals for three or four hundred pounds, and some of them, probably, not at any price."—Freiac.

Pinkerton enjoyed the acquaintance, in Paris, of the eminent geologists Haily, Werner. Patrin, Gillet-Laumont, and Daubuisson, and conversed with them on the subject of this Treatise. It was condemned by Edin. Rev., xxiii. 63. Pinkerton also composed one or two tragedies, never published contributed to the Capationne's Mogeries and lished, contributed to the Gentleman's Magazine, and was for a short time editor of the Critical Review. At the sale of Dawson Turner's Autographs, June 6-10, 1859, No. 385, The Pinkerton Correspondence, 700 ori-ginal letters, bound in 4 vols., brought £32.

A general survey of his literary character, based upon a critical estimate of Nos. 5, 6, 7, 9, 10, 11, and 13, (supra,) by no less a person than Edward Gibbon, will be found in An Address in which the latter suggested Pinkerton as a suitable editor for the projected Scriptores Rerum Britannicarum, or the Scriptores Rerum Anglicarum: It will be remembered that the great literary enterprise which Gibbon fundly designed, Henry Petric (ante) commenced,—and, alas! only commenced. Gibbon perhaps erred in his estimate of his friend's fitness for the propreed in his estimate of the arrival and a final and a posed task:

"His recent publications," exclaims the historian, "a Treatise on Medals, and the edition of the early Scotch poets, discover a animd replete with a variety of knowledge, and inclined to every litheral pursuit; but his decided propensity, such a propensity as made Bentley a critic and Bennell a geographer, attracts him to the study of the history and antiquities of Great Britais, and he is well qualified for this study, by a spirit of criticism, acute, discovering, and suspicious."—Uti supra, 840.

But what conflictence would the Celts have reposed in the additional labours of the author of the Dissertation on the editorial labours of the author of the Dissertation on the Scythians? Pinkerton, indeed, as his Correspondence and his whole literary history abundantly prove, had been at little pains to secure the friendship of his literary brethren:

"The pugnacious John Pinkerton. He was a man of an eager, soute, tenacious temper; a devourer of learning—a very helino librorum. . . He entertained or affected great respect for, and acquaintance with, the works of foreign literati; and, assuming as suffragians for their learning, indulged his own arrogance by employing their uncivil language, and translating the classical vituperation of menterie, impudentissime, into the St. Giles's dis-lect of 'you lie, scoundred.'.. His studious and laborious dis-position deserves praise; and the defects we have had to notice with jain, arose in youth from the arrogance of inexperience, and in his latter years from mortification at the failure of a long series of distresty attempts—some of which merited another fate." —Sir Walver Scott: Lon. Quar. Rev., July, 1820, 131, 135. "A man of considerable learning and some severity as well de acuteness of disposition."—Sir Walver Scottish Border. Too further notices of Pilneston, see Lon. Cont. Glore and Trumbull, 1796–1804; minister to England, 1806–11; Attorney-General of the U. States, 1811–14; member of the H. of Representatives of U. States, 1815; minister to Russia and to Naples, 1816; returned home, 1818, and elected a Senator of the U. States, 1820. Mr. Pinkney was greatly distinguished for his professional learning, forensic oratory, and remarkable command of foreible and appropriate language. He was certainly second to no one at the Bar of the United States; and in 1816, when he offered to resign his business to Mr. Justice Story, (see Story's Life and Letters, i. 278,) his profits amounted to $21,000 per annum. New York, graduated at Princeton College, 1775; entered upon the study of the law, but never practised; during the Revolution joined a company commanded by a professor of the college; acted for three years as clerk to his uncle, Lewis Pintard, Commissary for American prisoners in New York; officiated a short time as editor of the New York Daily Advertiser, and subsequently engaged in commerce; was leng City Inspector of New York, and for many years, and until the time of his death, acted as Scoretary to the old Mutual Insurance Company in the same city. He was the founder of the Historical Society of New York, and the zealous promoter of other useful institutions; an intelligent antiquary, and author of a number of papers in periodicals. Among the best-known of his productions are an account of the city of New Orleans, pub. in the N. York Medical Repository, and (if indeed truly attributed to him) a notice of Philip Freneau in the N. York Mirror, June 12, 1833. A life of Mr. Pintard (we hope that a selection from his writings will be included) is meditated by some of his family; and we trust that the project will not (like many of the kind) fall to the ground. Interesting notices of this scholar and philanthropist, by his intimate friend of many years, John W. Francis, M.D., will be found in Brancis's Old New York, 2d ed., 1858, 53-58, 140, 382. Part 4 consists of 15 Alphabetical Indexes,—a kind of epitome of the whole work.

"Though he quotes Leland with great familiarity and assurance, it is very probable he never saw any such thing as his Collectanea de Scriptor) as, but that his only true author, for Collectanes de Scriptora as, out that his only true author, for all that he pretends to bring out of that store-lones, was John Bule himself. His latia is clean enough; and his giving an account of some eminent popibl writers, that hived beyond sea in the beginning of the Reformation, is an acceptable piece of service. Wirgil.

"Pitt, engaging as a rival with Dryden, naturally observed his failures, and avoided them; and as he wrote after Pope's litad, he had an example of an exact, equable, and splendid versitication. With these advantages, seconded by great dilegence, he might successfully labour particular passages, and escape many errors. If the two versions are compared, perhaps the result would be that Dryden lends the reader forward by his general vigour and sprightliness, and Pitt often stops him to contemplate the excellence of a single couplet—that Dryden's faults are neglected in the languor of a cold and listless perpendict that Pitt pleased the critics and Dryden the people—that Pitt is quoted and Dryden read. He did not long enjoy the reputation which this great work deservedly conferred; for he left the world in 1748.—Dr. JORNSON: ub supra.

Pitt, Rt. Hon. William, Earl of Chatham. See CHATHAM.

Pitt, Rt. Hon. William, second son of the first-Earl of Chatham, May 28th, 1759-Jan. 23d, 1806, a native of Hayes, Kent. was admitted to Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, 1773; after leaving college, travelled for some time on the Continent; on his return home entered himself of Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the Bar in 1780; returned to Parliament for the borough of Appleby in 1781, and by his first speech gained an influence in pub-lic affairs, which steadily and rapidly increased, until he became, as his father had been in his day, the most powerful statesman of the time. In the many histories of that ful statesman of the time. In the many histories of that time must the events of Pitt's life be sought. We indicate, for the convenience of the reader, the following sources of information: 1. History of the Polit. Life of Pitt, by John Gifford, 1809, 3 vols. 4to; 2d ed., 1809, 3 vols. 8vo. This contains only the public life of Mr. Pitt, and that brought down no later than 1793; the author, who died in 1827, premised a continuation to include Pitt's private life, but it mayor.

"His whole training from infancy was such as fitted him to bear a part in parliamentary government; and, from the prime of his manhood to his death, all the powers of his vigorous mind were almost constantly exerted in the work of parliamentary government. He accordingly became the greatest master of the whole art of parliamentary government that has ever existed; a greater than Montague or Walpolo; a greater than his father Chatham, or his rival Fox; a greater than either of his illustrious successors, Canning and Peel."—Lond Macaulay: Life of Pitt, is Eacyc. "Mr. Pitt conceives his sentences before he utters them; Mr. Fox throws himself into the middle of his," &c.—R. Possox: Recoilee, by S. Respers, 121.

"In his luminous and comprehensive speeches in Parliamont Pitt has explained his motives and unfolded his views, his objects, and his designs."—Gifport's Life of Pitt.

"Pitt, tall and slender, had an air at once melancholy and sarcastic. His delivery was cold, his intonation monotonous, his section scarcely perceptible. At the same time, the lucidness and the fluency of his thoughts, the logic of his arguments, suddenly irradiated with flashes of eloquence, rendered his talout something above the ordinary line. . . . Ill dressed, without pleasure, without passion, greedy of power, he despised honours, and would not be any thing more than William Pitt."—Viscourt is Characteristics. Sketches of Eng. Lit., il. 277.

Respecting this celebrated Dissertation, already referred to, (see MACKINTOSH, RT. HON. SIR JAMES, p. 1181, supra,) for which it is supposed at least £500 were paid to the author, it is needless to say much; but a few lines of quotation will perhaps not be unacceptable to the reader. As regards his general merits as a philosophical writer,

As regards his general merits as a philosophical writer, few men have been so warmly eulogized by eminent critics: "Professor Playfair's works exhibit a combination of the soundest philosophy, and of the profession which place the author in the first rank of our classic writers."—Dudald Stewart. "He was certainly one of the best writers of his age, and we do not now recollect any one of his contemporaries who was so great a master of composition. There is a certain mellowness and richness about his style, which adorns without disguising the weight and nervousness which is its other great character-lette.—a sedate gracefulness and manly simplicity in the more level passages,—and a mild majority and considerate enthusiasm have a sedate gracefulness and manly simplicity in the more lavel passages,—and a mild majesty and considerate enthusiasm where he rises above them, of which we scarcely know where to fand any other example. —Lord Jeffer: Skelch, supra.

Plowden, Edmund, 1517-1585, a member of an ancient Shropshire family; studied arts, philosophy, and physic for three years at Cambridge; began the study of the common law in the Middle Temple, 1539; removed to Oxford and devoted himself for four years to his books, and was there admitted to the practice of physic and surgery; returned to his "jealous metress" and so sealously atoned for past neglect that he was made Summer Reader in the Middle Temple, 1557, Sergeant-at-Law, 1558, and Lent Reader, 1560. The name of Plowden is dear to all lawyers on account of his excellent collection entitled Les Commentaries ou Reports de divers Cases, esteants matters en ley, et de les arguments sur y ceux, en les temps des raignes les Roy Ed. les size, les Roigne Mary, le Roy et Roigne Ph. and Mary; et les Roigne Elizabeth. In French, Part 1, pub. Lon., 1571, fol.; both Parts subsequently in 1 vol. fol., as follows: 1878, 1584, 1588, 1599, 1613, 1684. Abridgment in French, by T. A., [Thomas Ashe,] 1607, 12mo. There was also pub. in 1662, 12mo. an English trans. of Plowden's Queries, (which will be found in French, appended to the last French ed. of the Commentaries, 1684, fol.,) under the title of Queries of the A Moot Book for Young Students Methodized, & by H. B. Phowden's Commentaries (trans. and edited by Mr. Broomly) appeared in English, with valuable References and the Queries, in 1760, fol., and were repub. 1769, 1869. vols. 8vo; 1779, fol.; Dubl., 1792, 2 vols. 8ve; Lon., 1816, 2 vols. 8vo. Plowden excuses himself (very need-lessly) for printing his Commentaries, on the ground that his MSS, had been often incorrectly copied by those to whom he lent them; see his Preface. The excellence of Plowden's collection has been the theme of learned culogists from his own day to ours,-from Lord Coke to Chancellor Kent.

"Works (at they well deserve) with all the profession of the w, of high account."—Lond Cone: Pref., 3 Rep. law.

His lordship, however, (see Lord Bacon's Works,) notes four erroneous cases.

"Most deservedly hear as high a character as any book of reports ever published in our law."—ILREGRAVE: Co. Lit., 23 a, n., larg. and But. ed.

"Plowden's Commentaries embraced the same period as the reports of Dyer. [See Dyer. Dier, or Dever. Sir James, ante.] They bear as high a reputation for accuracy as any ancient book of reports. ... The work is . . exceedingly interesting and instructive, by the ovidence it affords of the extensive learning, bound doctrine, and logical skill of the ancient English bar."—

Sir James Mackintosh's opinion of the oratorical abilities of Lord Plunket, as expressed to Alexander H. of Sir James by copious citations to the same effect.

"His great fame rests upon his eloquence, in which he was surpassed by none in his own time, hardly by any orator of former agos,"—Load Broughan. States. Time Gro. III., 335.

"Mr. Plunket, the greatest accession to parliamentary delaters that many years had produced, exerted a species of commanding eloquence and close reasoning in favour of concession to Roman Catholics which the House, already enriched with genius and talent from Irchard, had never yet witnessed from that country."—Lord Flucken: Monoir of the Whig Party, vol. ii.

"Lord Plunket was, in my opinion, the most powerful and able advocate the Catholics ever had. I will say that he, more than any other man, contributed to the success of the Roman Catholic Question."—Sir Robert Plein.

The testimony of Mr. Camping (who days appreciated

The testimony of Mr. Canning (who duly appreciated the services to the same cause of Grattan, O'Connell, and Sydney Smith) is to the same effect. Perhaps Mr. Plunket's greatest speech on the Roman Catholic Question was delivered February 28th, 1821, (that which followed his motion regarding Catholic Emancipation,) which proved him, exclaimed Sir James Mackintosh, "the greatest master of eloquence and reasoning then existing in public life," and made it evident, remarks Sir Archi-hald Alison, "that if the mantle of Romilly had descended on Mackintosh, that of Grattan had fallen on the shoulders of Plunket." (Hist. of Europe, 1815-52, ij. 472.) (Hist. of Europe, 1815-52, ii. 472.)

After his lordship's death, in 1854, a Memoir of his fe was promised,—to be written by Mr. Edward Ber-Life was promised,—to be written by Mr. Edward Berwick, President of Queen's College, Galway, and the grand-nephew of Grattan; but it would seem that this is to be one of the large class of books announced "in haste" and completed "at leisure"—or not at all. In 1655 this great scholar was threatened by the Parliamentary Commissioners with the loss of his Hebrew and Arabic Professorships; but this disgrace to the Roundhead party was happily prevented by the de-termined opposition of Drs. John Owen, (himself one of the Commissioners,) Seth Ward, John Wilkins, and John Wallis, who withstood the stupid and bigoted creatures to their face, and made them sensible of "the infinite contempt and reproach" which would reward such treat-ment of a man "whom all the learned, not of England ment of a man "whom all the learned, not of England only, but of all Europe, so justly admired for his vast knowledge and extraordinary accomplishments." detailed account of the life, translations into Arabic, and other publications, of Pocock, we refer to the excellent

Poc, A. S. To Love and to be Loved; a Story, N. York, 1851, 12mo.
Poc, Edgar Allan, 1811-1849, a native of Baltimore, the grandson of David Poc, a soldier of the American Revolution, and a son of David and Elizabeth Arnuld Poc. of the theatre, by the death of his parents Arnold Poe, of the theatre, by the death of his parents in 1$15 was left with his brother Henry and sister Rosalis in a state of "homeless poverty." Adopted by a kind-hearted merchant, Mr. Allan, of Baltimore, he was in 1816 placed at a school near London, and in 1822 removed to the University of Virginia, where he was a smally distinguished as a school rear London. equally distinguished as a scholar, an athlete, and a debaushee. In the first-named capacity he elicited the respect of his tutors, in the second the envy and admiration of his class-mates; in the third he offended the academical authorities and was expelled from the college. The refusal of Mr. Allan to provide funds for losses at the gambling-table aroused the ire of his reckless ward, and he determined to follow the example of his noble fellow-poet, Lord Byron, and aid the Greeks in their struggle for political and religious liberty. He never reached Athens, but in about a year after his departure from America was shipped home from St. Petersburg through the good offices of the American minister, Mr. Henry Middleton. Mr. Allan-whose long-suffering and endurance of Poe's waywardness will remind the reader of good Uncle Contarine's trials with Oliver Goldsmith, see pp. 688-689, supra—again opened his arms to the prodigal, and placed him as a student at the Military Academy at West Point. The strict discipline of this excellent institution was by no means suited either to the temper or habits of the new cadet, and in less than a twelvementh he received a significant intimation of the propriety of a change of residence. Poe again presented himself before Mr. Allan's door, and was again received into a household from which, for some unexplained of-fence, he was shortly to be ejected forever. Poe tells us that the cause of his dismission was the hostility engendered by his ridicule of Mr. Allan's choice in taking to his bosom (whilst Poe was at West Point) a wife too young in years to be a fitting successor to the first Mrs. Allan. But this would have been so slight an offence, compared with the ordinary character of Poc's transgressions, that it may be presumed the relief would have been agreeable to his benefactor. Neither the old husband (though Allan indeed was not an old husband) nor the young wife, in these ill-assorted unions, is apt to be offended with a little raillery on the score of disparity. In such cases both are victors, and the conquest of youth and of ex-periance respectively may be considered about equipol-lent. Thrown now entirely upon his own resources, Poe lent. Thrown now entirely upon his own resources, Poe determined to be of the number of those whose motto is "Tenui musam meditamur avena," ("we cultivate literature on a little catmeal,") and he had, indeed, already soficited the attention of the public by a poetical pamphist (pp. 71, 8vo) pub. at Bultimore in 1829, entitled Al Asrael, Tamerlane, and Minor Poems. (See Philobiblion. M. York, Nos. 2 and 4.) Some of these verses, written in his 16th, 17th, and 18th years, are thought to display powers of no ordinary cast. In 1833 he gained (by means of his beautiful chirography) a prize offered by the Baltimors Baturday Visitor by his tale entitled A Manuscript found in a Bottle; and May, 1835, to January, 1837, he suited the Southern Literary Messenger, pub. at Richmond. Whilst residing is this city, he married his cousin, his 16th, 17th, and 18th years, are thought to display powers of no ordinary cast. In 1833 he gained (by means of no ordinary cast. In 1833 he gained (by means of his beautiful chirography) a prize offered by the Baltimore Hospital, Ootober 7, 1840, at the age of thirty-eight years. This is but a sad thit of the Bottle; and May, 1835, to January, 1837, he builted the Southern Literary Messenger, pub. at Richand. Whits residing id this city, he married his cousin, triginals Clemm. The lady survived the union about ten that is but the self-sacrificing devotion of her mother matched over the arring instand and the reckless widower matched over the arring instand and the reckless widower match have the self-sacrificing devotion of her mother than the self-sacrificing the self-sacrificing than the self-sacrificing mond. Whilst residing id this city, he married his cousin, Wriginia Clemm. The lady survived the union about ten yaars; but the self-sacrificing devotion of her mother washed over the arring husband and the reckless widower ight in vindication of that character from the irregularities of which she had long been the greatest sufferer. In 1837 Poe removed to Baltimore, then to Philadelphia, and at the close of the same year we find him in New York, and a contributor to the Naw York Review. In 1838 he pub. in book-form, with a continuation, a story commenced in the Southern Literary Messenger, entitled The Narrative of Arthur Gordon Pvm. of Nantackat. N The Narrative of Arthur Gordon Pym, of Nantucket, N York, 12mo; repub. with Stories of Humour, and a few Essays, 1856, 12mo; repub. separately, Lon., Dec. 1861,

In the same year he returned to Philadelphia, and from May, 1839. to June, 1840, he discharged the editorial duties connected with Burton's Gentleman's Magazine. It was in the latter year that he gave to the world a collection of all the prose stories he had then written, under the title of Tales of the Grotesque and the Arabesque, Phila., 2 vols. 12mo. From November, 1840, to about April, 1842, be was editor of Graham's Magazine; in the spring of 1843 he gained a prize of $100 by his story of The Gold Bug, pub. in the Dollar Newspaper of Philadelphia. In this city, also, he proposed the publication of a monthly periodical to be called The Peun Magazine; on further thoughts to be easied the Felin Magazine; on further thoughts he preferred the title of The Stylus; but the project got no further than the prospectus. In the autumn of 1844 he again removed to New York, where the fame of his tales of The Descent into the Mælstrom, The Premature Burial, The Purloined Letter, The Murders of the Rue Morgue, and (the sequel of the last) The Mystery of Marie Roget had revived the public curiosity respecting their author. This interest was redoubled in February of the next year by the publication, in the second number of Colton's Whig Review, of the poem of the Raven,—Poe's best-known production. In the same year, (1845,) after a six months' engagement with Willis and Morris as assistant editor of the Mirror, he became associated with Mr. Charles F. Briggs and Mr. Watson in the editorial man-agement of the Broadway Journal. In October, 1845, this periodical passed entirely into his possession, and, as might have been surmised, it did not long survive the connection: the last number was pub. January 3d, 1846. Again left at liberty, he contributed to Godey's Lady's Again left at liberty, he contributed to trodey's Lady's Book, May to November, 1846, a series of six papers entitled The Literati of New York City. They were pub. collectively, with additional sketches, together with Marginalia, Suggestions, and Essays, with a Sketch of the Author by R. W. Griswold, in a 12no vol., pp. 607, N. York, 1850. This vol. is the third in the collective eds. of Poe's Works pub. by Redfield, 1856, 4 vols. 12mo. In the autumn and winter of 1846 (he was living at Ford-ham, a few miles from the city of New York) Poe's necessities clicited a generous appeal from a generous man,—N. P. Willis, in the Home Journal,—and a substantial response for a time relieved the res angusta domi, -which yet Poe was too proud to admit, and, indeed, denied in a remarkable letter pub. in the Home Journal, Dec. 30, 1846. In a few weeks after this date, a sick and suffering yet a loved and loving wife was removed from greater "evil to come." In February, 1848, Poe delivered at the Society Library in New York a lecture on the Cosmogony of the Universe, which he pub. in the same year under the title of Eureka, or The Universal, a Prose Poom, N. York, 12mo, pp. 144. It was reviewed in the (New York) Literary World, July 29, 1818, and in the ensuing September (20th) Poe pub. in the same periodical a letter addressed to C. F. Hoffman, the editor, in which he attacks his critic with more vigour than politeness. Shortly after this he became engaged to be married to "one of the most brilliant women of New England;" but the prospective groom took effective measures to prevent the consummation of the treaty, and the lady, thoroughly disenchanted, released the gentleman from the engagement,—if not without tears, certainly without regreg. A few months later we find him again betrothed, and this size to a friend of his active with the contraction. and this time to a friend of his early youth; but exposure to the night air, resulting from the debility of intexionembalmed the least creditable points of his friend's cha-

Mrs. Osgood bears testimony to his "Christian, grace-fet, and almost tender reverence for all women who won his respect," and to "the charming love and confidence that existed between his wife and himself," (letter to Dr. Griswold;) and the mother of that wife declares that "he was more than a son to myself, in his long-continued and affectionate observance of every duty to me."

of Philadelphia, to be illustrated by letters as yet unpublished, has been for some time announced.

"Poe," remarks Mr. Gilfällan, "is distinguished by many stylege and many manners. He is the author of fictions as matter-of fact in their construction and language as the stories of Pefos, and of takes as welrd and wonderful as those of Hoffman; of amstery strains trembling, if not with heart, with passion, and suffused with the purple glow of love, and of peems, dirgos either in form or in spirit, into which the genus of desolstion has sited its drearnest essence; of verses gay with apparent but shallow, joy, and of others dark with a misery which sometimes visits the soul in dreams," "Taird Gally of Lil. Port.

"The flow of all Poe's verse is remarkable for ease and gracefulness; it is hardly ever hampered by the difficulties of rhyme and rhythm which exist to a great degree in the metres of which he makes use. . . A perusal of his critical essays leads us to the belief that his ability did not at all lie in that way. They are almost entirely taken up by minute verial fault-finding; there is hardly any thing like the discussion of principles; and many of the papers are evidently dictated by personal spite, and sflord as a very unfavourable notion of the tone of American journalism. [See our comments, p. 1126, ante, Longzellow, Herret Wabsworks.] But Poe's great power lay in writing tales, which rank in a class by thouselves and have their characteristics strongly delibed."—Fraser's Mag.; copied in Boet. Liv. Ago, Iv. 158, 159.

"Edgar A. In the United States more than twenty edits. have been pub.,—in N. York, Boston, and Philadelphia. Of the edits. pub. in N. York, to Appleton's there is appended an Analytical Index: Barnes's (School) ed. is illustrated by Notes by Prof. Boyd; and to Carters' is prefixed a Dissertation on the Genius of Robert Pollok, by Rev. James Scott, the editor of the Life, Letters, and Literary Remains of Robert Pollok, N. York, 12mo. The Life of Pollok, by his brother, was pub. at Edinburgh in 1843, p. 8vo; and to this work, and the authorities annexed, we refer the reader for fuller notices of Pollok and his principal pro-duction,—a poem the neglect of which by English critics is as observable as its popularity with Scotch and American readers. For his portion of this neglect Jeffrey was consured by Christopher North in Noctes Ambros, Dec. 1828, and Aug. 1834,—Blackw. "The Course of Time, for so young a man, was a wast achievement. . . . He had much to learn in composition; and, had he lived, he would have looked almost with humiliation on much that is at present culogized by his devoted admirers. But the soul of poetry is there, though often dimly enveloped, and many passages there are, and long ones too, that heave and hurry and glow along in a divine enthusiasm."—JOHN WILSON: Blackus. Mag., xxx. 084.

"The Course of Time' is a very extraordinary poem: vast in its conception—vast in its plan—vast in its materials—and vast, if very far from perfect, in its achievement. The wonderful thing is, indeed, that it is such as we find it, and not that its imperfections are numerous. It has nothing at all savouring of the little or conventional in it; for he passed at once from the merely elegant and graceful."—D. M. Monr. Sketches of Poet. Lit.

"Pollok's 'Course of Time,' much overlauded on its appearance, is the immature work of a man of genius who possessed very imperfect cultivation. It is clumsy in plan, tediously discretative, and tastelessly magniloquent; but it has passages of good and genuine poetry."—Por. Spations, Univ. of Saint Andrews: Hist. of Eng. Lit., chap. xiv.

Pomfret, Henrietta Louisa Fermor, Countess of. Her Correspondence, &c.: edited by Louisa Fermor, (?) Countess of Pomfret. See Harrond, Frances, Pomfret, John, 1667-1703, a native of Luton, Bedfordshire; educated at Queen's College, Cambridge; became Vicar of Malden, and was presented to a living of greater value, institution into which was at first refused by Bishop Compton, in consequence of a misconstruction of a passage in the parson's poem of The Choice. Pom-fret made a satisfactory vindication; but whilst he lin-gered in London, engaged in this business, he raught the smallpox, the fatal termination of which abruptly ended smallpox, the fatal termination of which abruptly ended alike his anxieties and his hopes. A volume of his Poems—The Choice, and others—was pub. in 1699; and in 1724 appeared his Remains: a vol. containing two poetical pieces,—Reason, and Dies Novissima, or The Last Epiphany; a Pindaric Ode. This vol. was pub. by a friend, under the name of Philalethes. The 4th ed. of The Choice was pub. 1701, fol.; the Tenth Edition of his Poems on Several Occasions, with an Account of his Life and Writings, to which are added his Remains, was issued in 1740, 8vo. Many eds. of his Poems have since appeared; and they are repub. in Johnson's and Chalmers's collections.

"His 'Choice' exhibits a system of life adapted to common netions and equal to common expectations; such a state as affords plenty and tranquillity, without exclusion of intellectual giessures. Perhaps no composition in our language has been oftener perused than Pomfret's 'Choice.' In his other poems there is as easy volubility; the pleasure of smooth metre is afforded to the ear, and the mind is not oppressed with ponderous or entangled with intricate sentiment. He pleases many; and he who pleases many must have some species of merit."—Dr. Johnson: Lives of the Prets.

The vol. containing Pomfret's Poems, Southey tells us, (Life and Corresp., chap. i.,) was one of the companions of his early days, and (for who does not remember with a melancholy pleasure his "first books"?) he seems to have contracted a lasting admiration for the bard. least this is a fair inference from his query,

"Why is Pomfret the most popular of the English Poets? the fact is certain, and the solution would be useful."—Specimens of the Later English Poets, 1807, 1. 91.

To this Mr. Campbell responds,-but his quotation is not accurate.-

"It is asked, in Mr. Southey's 'Specimens of English Poetry,' why Pomfret's 'Choke' is the most pupular poem in the English language: it might have been demanded, with equal propriety, why London Bridge is built of Parisn marble."—Compbell's Spe-

The best proof of Pomfret's loss of popularity is the fact that in a day distinguished for the republication of the earlier poets, Pomfret is neglected. Mr. Hallam is no exception to this distaste :

"Then came Blackmore, with his eple poems of Prince Arthur and King Arthur, and Pomfret, with his Choice, both popular in their own age, and both intolerable, by their frigid and tame monotony, in the next."—Lit. Hist. of Europe, 4th-ed., 1854, iil.

Pope, Alexander, May 21, 1688-May 30, 1744, was a native of London, the son of a "merchant who dealt in Hollands" (linens) of Broad Street, and subsequently of Louised States, who should the time of the Resolution retired to Binheld, Windoor Forest, with a fortune of ten to twenty thousand pounds. The smaller sum is stated on the authority of Martha Blount. He cuposed have tirement for twenty nine years, dying, October, 1717, in his 75th year, at Chiswick, where he was buried His widow removed with the poet to Twickenham in Docember, 1717, or January, 1718, and she was the object of his warm affection and reverential care until her death, his warm affection and reverential care until her death, which occurred, at the great age of ninety, in June, 1733 Lord Herrey expire-sed his contempt for the unitator of llorace in the will known line,

After hearing her testimony, we have no occasion to marve that her ladyship was a willing witness.

Both of Pope's parents were Roman Catholics; and in the same faith he lived and died. Some will have it that the truth is that, although influenced by both, he persuaded by neither. He tells us that he "hisped in numbers," and certain one of the first uses to which he devoted his early kniledge of Greek and Latin—sequired under priestly this and at private schools—was the translation of the Me morphoses of Ovid. Between 1706 and 1709 (see London Athen, 1857, to the world in 1711, ito, commended by Addison in The Spectator, and attacked by Donnis (who was curaged by Popes strictures) in a pamphlet more remarkable for ingour of style than annability of spirit. The Essay

The Essay on Criticism, together with other of the principal productions of its author, we shall notice more at length on a later page of this summary. To the Essay on Criticism succeeded the Messiah, first published in The Spectator, after receiving the revisions of Steele, the Elegy to the Memory of an Unfortunate Lady, The Rape of the Lock, first pub in Lintot's Miscellany, 1712, 8vc, (Pope's Miscellany, 2 vols 12mo.) and issued in a much enlarged and improved shape, by Lintot, in 1714, 8vc In the Guartian for 27th April, 1713, (No. 40), appeared Pope's ironical comparison between his own Pastorals and those of Philips, (see PHILLIPS, AMBROSS.) and in the same vasar ironical comparison between his own Pastorias and those of Philips, (see PHILIPs, AMEROSS.) and in the same year he pub. his Ode on St Cecilia's Birth-Day, folio, and also, in a folio volume, his poem on Windsor Forest, of which part was written at sixteen, about the same time as his Pastorals, and a part refers to the Peace, the then prevailing topic in all circles of society.

proof that descriptive poetry was by no means the excellence of Pope. He draws this inference from the few images introduced into this poem which would not equally belong to any other place. He must in juire whether 'Windsor Forest' has in reality anything peculiar. The stag-chase is not, he says, no reality anything peculiar. The stag-chase is not, he says, no reality anything peculiar. The stag-chase is not, he says, no reality anything peculiar. The stag-chase is to criticate with little exactness. Yet Pope has directed that we should in every work regard the author's end. The stag-chase is the main subject of Somerville and might therefore be properly dilated into all its circumstances, in Pope it was only incidental, and was to be despatched in a few lines. In October, 1713, he issued proposals for a translation of Homer's Iliad, which was completed in 1719 and pub in 6 vols 4to and folio, one guines per volume, 1715—20 In the Notes he seems to have had the assistance of Broome, Jortin, and another scholar, whose name has not transpired. The Life of Homer which prefaces the work has been noticed in our lite of Thomas Parnell, D. D. (supra). In our sketch of Addison we have referred to the ill feeling between Pope and the former, produced by the simultaneous appearance of Pope and Tickells(!) Veision of the Iliad. Of Tickell's virsion it will be remembered that one book only appeared. Encouraged by the great success of this enterprise, and stimulated by losses in the "South bea bubble, in 1722 Pope sought subscriptions for a translation of the Odyssey, in 5 vols 4to and folio at one guines per volume. The work appeared,—it is asserted that the translation was not commenced until 1723—according to these conditions, in 1725. Of this version Pope has the credit, generally, of twelve Books, the other twelve were translated by William Broome and Elijah I enten,—as already noticed on pp 25 and 55 et this Dictionary.

To return to our chronological series in 1715 Pope pub in an octavo volume, his poem of the Temple of kaine, which was attacked by Dennis in a hydra headed painphlet cutified Remarks upon Mr Pope's Translation of Home. days we are assured that the whole town gave it to Pope. In 1741 a fourth book was added; and the whole was pub-under the title of The New Dunciad, as it was found in the year 1741, with the Illustrations of Scriblerus and Notes Variorum, 1742, 4to Among the assailants of this unsparing sature was Dennis, who, having pub Remarks on the Rape of the Lock, in 1728, 8vo followed in the next year with Remarks on the Dunciad, 5vo In 1732 Pope gave to the world his kpistle to Lord Bathurst, and the poem On the Use of Riohis, and also published, amony mously, the First Epistle of the four which cumpose the Essay on Man, the Second and the Third Epistles, also without his name followed in the most a sections. ties, also without his name, followed in the next year, and the Four Fpistles were pub collectively, with his name, in 1734, 4to The rest of his publications, all of a minor character, with the exception of one about to be noticed, will be registered in their order in the (HROMO-logical List of Pope's Publications which follows In May, 1735, was pub, by Fdmund Curll, the first of six volumes 8vo, and also in 12mo, 1735-39, (four wree pub, 1735-36,) known in the book market as Pope's Literary Correspondence, being a Collection of Letters which passed between him and several himment Persons. More letters were sent, and were published, but were denounced by Pope as clandestinely obtained and not correctly given. As Curli had promised the publication of letters of lords, which would have been a breach of privilege, he was summoned before the House of Lords for examination. He behaved courageously, (lavishing no flattery on Pope) and, as no letters of the peers named, or of any other poers, were in the collection, he escaped without haim. We lack space for the details of the story, but it will be found in the lives of Pope by Roscos, Johnson, and others, and has been succincity re-lated by Mr Disracli in his Nariative of the Extraordinary Transactions respecting the Publication of Popes Letters (186-189) (Quarrols of Authors Miscell of Lit, ed 1868,

Dr Johnson, although he appears not to have leen aware of the sult he intricacy of this extraordinary plot has justly drawn this interior. Some new light on this subject will be found in London Athenseum, 1851, 815 and 1860, in 279, 316, 648 Certain it is that in 1737 Pope put forth a volume with the title Works in Prose containing Letters of A Pope to beveral of his Friends, &c, 4to, and also in folio (For vol ii, see Chronological List, &c.) As may be readily imagined, Pope did not let his letters pass to the press without omissions, alterations, and additions to suit his own taste or what he supposed to let he taste of his prospective readers (See Athen, 1854, 835, 875, 907, Unningham a forthcoming seil of Fone & Works)

without omissions, atterations, and additions to suit his own taste or what he supposed to let the taste of his prospective readers (See Athen, 1854, 835, 875, 907, Cunningham s forthcoming edit of Fope's Works)

Pope had now for nearly forty years reigned supreme in the Republic of Letters,—his house at Twickenham the tavourite resort of wits who sought smusement, and of nobles who coveted literary immortality by the conjunction of their names with that of the great master,—when that summons which fame cannot avert nor riches postpone disturbed his repose he died, after receiving the last rites of his Church, on the 30th day of May, 1744. (See Boi korron, on the 30th day of May, 1745, ante.) With that fondnoss for the titled great which had distinguished him through life, he appointed Lord Bolingbroke his hierary executor, the trust to be devolved on the Earl of Marchmont should the former not be living. To Warburton, who by his means had gained a wife and a mitre, he bequeathed the property of his works, which netted the polemical Churchman (as Johason estimates) the handsome sum of four thousand pounds. There were also two female friends of the poet, of whom the reader may expectations account,—Teress and Marthas Blount, the first horn in 1888, (died 1759,) and the just in 1690 (died 1763;) but they have little to do with the literary history of their famous associate, and to gratify other than literary carlesity we have neither space nor time. To assert that the character of these ladies—of Martha Blount especially—had never been impugned by commentators on Pope's domestic affairs would be going further than Mr. Bowles, and further than the truth. But we are glad to be able to record the verdict of Mr. Ros-coe, which is fully endorsed by one of the most acuts of coe, which is fully endorsed by one of the most acute of the late inquirers into the biography of Pope, (see Athon., 1854, 999—910, also, 1856, 1398.)

"Roscoe well observes," remarks the critic just referred to, "that the intimacy which subsisted between Martha Blount and Pope 'was nothing more than a sincer and affectionate friendship, begun in early youth, and continuing with a imputed increase of esteem and attachment through life. ..

Even after the death of Pope she maintained an intercourse with persons of the bighest character, rank, and Lishion.'"—Athen, 1854, 909.

Aben, 1854, 009.

The intelligent commentator in the Athenæum illustrates the subject by an interesting letter, before unpublished, addressed by Pope to the god father of the young ladies, dated 25 Dec., 1725. The critic appears to be as successful in the vindication of Teresa's character as in lished, addressed by Pope to the god father of the young ladies, dated 25 Dec., 1725. The critic appears to be as successful in the vindication of Teress' character as in his championship of Martha against her libellers. He also defends Pope (Athen., 1854, 837-318) against the charges of love of great company and ostentatious parade of his wealth,—an accusation brought by Dr. Johnson in the lines which we are about to quote "The person of Pope," rumarks Johnson, "is well known not to have been herned by the nikest model. He has, in his account of the 'Little Club,' compared himself to a spider, and by anothers is described as protuberant behind and betore. He is said to have been becutiful in his mann, y but he was of a constitution originally feeble and weak, and, as bodies of a tender frame are easily distorted, his dafor inity was probably in part the effect of life application. His stature was no low that, to bring him to a level with common tables, it was not essay to take his seat. But his face was not devidentially, on accidental distortion, his vital functions were so much discribed that his life was a 'long discasse'. His most frequent assainate was the headache, which he was do relieve by inhaling the steam of coffee, which he very frequently required. Most of what can be told concerning his petity peculiarities was communicated by a femile domestic of the Barl of Oxford, who knew him perhaps after the middle of fifts. He was then so weak as to stand in perpetual need of formale attendance; extremely sensible of cold, so that he wore a kind of fur doublet under a shirt of very course waim lines with fine alesses. When he row, he was uvested in a bodice made of stiff canvas, being carre able to hold himself etect till they were laced, and he then put on a finant waitstooat. One said was contracted. His lag ware so slender that he elegand the made of stiff canvas, being carre able to hold himself etect till they were laced, and he they have been too him, he will have our or not only the bard of the made

"Next to the pleasure of contemplating his possessions seems to be that of enumerating the men of high rank with whom he was acquainted, and whose notice he loudly proclaims not to have been obtained by any practice of meanness or servility,—a busst which was never denied to be true, and to which very few posts have ever applied. Pope never set genus to sale, he never lastered those whom he did not love, or praised those whom he did not love, or praised those whom he did not extens...—Journal of the process have a set of the process of the process have a set of the process have a first in Pope to give all his friendship to lorde, who thought they honoured him by being with him, and to shoosessed lords as Barington, Cobbam, and Bolingbrokel... And then always saying. I do not value you for being a lord; which was a sure proof that he did."—Boswell's Johnson, by Greber, ed. 1848, 604.

But hear something on the other side:

But hear something on the other side:

"Johnson . . . tells us that he talked too much 'of his money'. . . Why, it were as reasonable to prefer a like charge against other men because in their letters they make meaten of their wives and children. To Fope, whose whole life was but prolonged suffering, his garden, his grucumx, and his ripse, were wife and children,—very thing. . . . So far, indeed, was Tope from neeking lords for his acquaintance, that hiscan he did know sought him, and those who sought kim were amongst the most distinguished and intellectual menos his agas. To Pope, more than to any other man, literature is indebted for its undependent position: he found it service and base, and he made it free."—Albem., 1854, 859.

Lady Montague, indeed, speaks very differently; but her ladyship was no friend to the poet:

isoyship was no friend to the poet:

"Pope courted with the utmost assiduity all the old men from whom he could hope a legacy,—the Duke of Buckingham, Lord Peterborough, Sir G. Kneller, Lord Bolingbroke, Mr. Wyolerley, Mr. Congreve, Lord Harcourt, &c., and I do not doubt prejected to sweep the Dean's [Swift's] whole inheritance if he could have porsuaded him to throw up his deanery and come to die in his house, and his general preaching agazuit money was meant to induce people to throw it away that he might pick it up "—Letter to the Counters of Bute, June 23, 1752.

Johnson does not fail to notice that

"He passed over peers and statesmen to inscribe his 'Had' to Congrove, with a magnanimity of which the praise had been complete, had his friend's virtue been equal to his wit," and adds

"Why he was chosen for so great an honour it is not now pos-sible to know. There is no trace in literary history of any par-ticular intimacy between them. The name of Congreye appears in the letters among those of his other friends, but without any observable distinction or consequence "-Life of Pope, 102-103.

But Lord Macaulay (Essays, ed. 1854, nn. 51-52,) suggests a solution of this difficulty, which we imagine will be accepted as a satisfactory one.

Even in the greatest company he sometimes imitated the immortal baid whom he professed to render into

In that way of conversing I should have all the pleasure that I can possibly propose, without the disappointment when Mr. Pope falls askep, not the dread of your taking leave because you are wearry."—Strah, Durhas of Mariborough, to Lord Marchmont, March 16, 1742.

It is recorded to his praise that

"The virtues which seem to have had most of his affection were liberality and fidelity of friendship, in which it does not appear that he was other than he describes himself. . . In the duties of friendship he was zealous and constant; . . . it does not appear that he lost a single friend by coldness or injury; those who loved him once continued their kindness."—Josneson; not appear that he lost a single irred by contact, of the states who loved him once continued their kindness,"—Johnson:

We shall have occasion on a later page to refer to various sources for fuller information on the life and writings of Pope than our limits enable us to give; but it is proper at this stage of our sketch to notice the new discoveries elicited by the painstaking investigations of writers, who in the columns of Notes and Queries, (Popiana, &c., vol.*x, &c.,) and of the Atheneum, (1854, 835, 875, 907, 942; 1856, 780, 839, 899, 1397; 1857, 693, 829, 911, 1206, 1232, 1451; 1858, Pt. 1, 585, 622, 654; 1860, 11. 151, 710,) have given the results of their studies to the public.

"It is no extravagant arithmetic," remarks Mr Robert Carruthers, whose own intelligent labours in this field are hereafter to be noticed, "to say that more authentic information regarding the personal and literary instruy of Pope has transpired within the last three or four years than had accumulated during the previous contury"—Alben, 1856, 839, 1807.

The Essay was neglected until Pope "packed up and directed twenty copies" to Lord Lanedowne, the Duke of Buckingham, and other "great men."

"One of these gentlemen himself [Pope] can tell you that his admirable 'Essay on Crificism' Lay upon the bookseller's hands for some time."—Assurtance: "Works, I. 110.

Warburton endeavours to give the appearance of a consistent scheme to the poem; but before Pope knew the divine (see Essar ox May, post) he always spoke c. it as "an irregular collection of thoughts" thrown togs her as Horace's Art of Poetry was. (See Richardsonial 4, 264.) Addison also (Spectator, 253) compares it in irregularity to Horace's Art of Poetry. Prefixed to the Dunciad will be found the opinions, favourable and unfavourable, of various critics on the Essay on Criticism and several other of the author's works. Among these cited opinions on the Essay on Criticism is that of John Dennis, who complains that lis precepts are false, or trivial, or both; his thoughts are crude and abortive, his expressions abourd, his numbers harsh and unmasked, his rhyme trivial and common; instead of majesty, we have something that is very mean; instead of gavity, something that is very boyish; and instead of perspicuity and lucid order, we have too often obscurity and confusion."—Reflections, Critical and Satirical, &c.

Addison is also quoted:

"The Essay on Criticism, which was published some months since, is a master-piece in its kind.... There are some of them [the observations] uncommon, but such as the reader must assent to, when he sees them explained with that ense and perspiralty in which they are delivered. As for these which are the most known and the most received, they are pinced in so beantiful a light, and fliustrated with such apt allusions, that they have in them all the graces of novelty, and make the reader, who was before acquained with them, still more convinced of their truth and solidity."—The Speciotor, No. 263, Dec. 20, 1711.

Lady Montagn found but few "uncommon observations;" but, apart from her bitter hostility, her dictum is of little weight when contrasted with Addison's:

"I admired Mr. Pope's "Essay on Criticism' at first very much," she telle us, "because I had not then read any of the ancient critics, and did not know that it was all stolen."

We eite some opinjous: Addison is also quoted:

We cite some opinions:
"For a person only twenty years old to have produced such an Essay, so replete with knowledge of life and manners, such accurate observations on men and books, such variety of literature, such strong good sense and refined taste and judgment, has been the subject of frequent and of just admiration."— Jegges Warrox.

"A work which displays such extent of comprehension, such micety of distinction, such acquaintance with mankind, and such knowledge both of ancient and modern learning, as are not often attained by the maturest age and longest experience. One of his greatest, though of his carliest, works is the "Essay on Criticism," which, if he had written nothing else, would have placed him among the first critice and the first poets, as it exhibits overly mode of excellence that can embellish or dignify diductic composition,—selection of matter, novelty of arrangement, justness of precept, splendour of illustration, and propriety of digression. I know not whether it be pleasing to consider that he produced this neces at twenty, and never afterwards excelled it: he that delights himself with observing that auch powers may be soon attained, cannot but grieve to think that-life was ever after at a stand. To mention the particular beautics of the Resay would be unprofitably tedious; but I cannot forhear to observe that the comparison of a student's progress in the sciences with the journey of a traveller in the Alps, is perhaps the best that English poetry can show."—Jourson: Life of Paper, xi. 129, 121.

"The quantity of thought and observation in this work, for so young a man as Pope was when he write it, is wonderful.... The conciseness and felicity of the expression are equally remarkable.... Nothing can be more original and happy than the general remarks and illustrations in the Essay: the critical rules had down are too much those of a school, and of a confined one."—Haziry: Lecte. on the Eng. Prets, I.ect. IV.

"The praise that is uppermost in one's mind of the Essay in Criticism is its rectifude of legislation. Pope is an orthodox doctor—a champion of the good old cause... It is of the right good English tempor,—thoughtful and ardent, discreet and generous, firm with sensibility, bold and sedate, manly and poliched. He establishes himself in well-chosen positions of natural strength, commanding the field; and he occupies them in the style of an experienced leader, with forces judiciously disposed, and showing a resolute front every wy of defence and offence."—Prop. Written at the instance of Mr. Caryl, with the object of healing a breach caused by "a frolic of gallantry, rather too familiar," in which Robert, seventh Lord Petre, cut off a lock of Arabella Ferince's hair. (See Johnson's Life of Pope, Cunningham's cd., 18, n.)

"The most airy, the most ingenious, and the most delightful of all his compositions. . . The 'Rapo of the Look' stands forward, in the classes of literature, as the most exquisite example of fudicious poetry. Berkeley congratulated him upon the display of powers more truly poetical than he had shown before: with elegance of description and justness of precepts, he had now exhibited boundless fertility of invention. He always considered the internative of the machinery with the action as his most successful exertion of poetical art. He indeed could never afterwards produce any thing of such unexampled excellence. Those performances which strike with wonder are combinations of skilful genius with happy casualty; and it is not likely that any felicity like the deservery of a new race of preternatural agents should happen twice to the same man. . To the praises which have been accumulated on 'The Rape of the Lock' by readers of every class, from the critic to the waiting-maid, it is difficult to make any addition. Of that which is universally allowed to be the most attractive of all indicrous compositions, let it rather now be inquired from what sources the power of pleasing is derived."—Johnson: Life of Pope, 18, 20, 124.

"This seems to be Mr. Pope's most finished production, and is, perhaps, the most perfect in our language. It exhibits stronger powers of imagination, more harmony of numbers, and a greater knowledge of the world, than any other of this poet's works; and it is probable, if our country were called upon to work is and its probable, if our country were called upon to sublimity and majesty equal to the Preduced nothing in point of sublimity and majesty equal to the Paradise Lock is the best satire extant; that it contains the trues and inclusing like in the delicacy of a general

"It is the most exquisite specimen of fitigree work ever invented. It is admirable in proportion as it is made of nothing.

... It is made of gauze and silver spangles. The most glittering appearance is given to every thing,—to paste, pomatum, billiets-doux and patches. Airs, languid airs, breathe around; the atmosphere is perfuned with affectation. A toilette is described with the solemnity of an alter raised to the goldens of Vanity, and the history of a silver bodkin is given with all the pomp of heraldry. No pains are spared, no profusion of ornament, no spleadour of poetic diction, to set off the meanest things. The balance between the concasted from and the assumed gravity is as nicely trimmed as the balance of power in Burope. The little made great, and the great little. You hardly know whether to laugh or weep. It is the triumph of insignificance, the apotheses of foppery and folly. It is the perfection of the mock-heroic "—Hastitiz Lects. on the Rag. Poets, Lect. Compared with any other mock-heroic in our language, it shines in pure supremacy for elegance, completeness, point, and playfulness. 6. ELOISA TO ABELARD.

6. ELOISA TO ABELIARD.

"His first inclination to an attempt of that tender kind arose, as Mr. Savage told me, from his perusal of Prior's 'Nut-Brown Maid.' How much he has surpassed Prior's work it is not necessary to mention, when perhaps it may be said with justice that he has excelled every compelition of the same kind. The mixtures of religious hope and resignation gives an elevation and signify to disappointed love which images merely natural cannot bestow. The gloom of a convent strikes the imagination with far greater force than the solitude of a grove. One of the mast happy productions of human wit. . The story, thus skilifully adopted, has been diligently improved. Pope has left mothing behind him which seems more the effect of studious perwiverance and laborious revisal. Here is particularly observable the curious fisicitus, a fruitful soil and caroful cultivation. Here is no crudences mor aspective of language. The sources from which sentiments which have so much vigour and efficacy have been drawn are shown to be the mystic writers by the learned muthor [Joseph Warton] of the Essay on the Life and dentes of Pope. "Dotason: Life of Pope, 1, 128.

"Me, Pope's 'Eloisa to Abelard' is such a chef-d'œuve that neckting of the kind can be relished after it. Yet it is not the story itself, nor the sympathy it excites in us, as Dr. Johnson would have us think, that constitutes the principal merit in that insurangalable poem. It is the happy use he has made of the monastic gloom of the Paracleta, and of what I call Papistical machinery, which gives it its capital oharm; so that I am almost denimed to woulder (if I could woulder at any of that woulder's criticism) that the did not take notice of this beauty, as almost denimed to woulder it is capital planm; in him more beauty a similarient rel'als for it."—Mason: Life of Whitchead, 1788,

What sulpable surelessuese! Johnson especiallyies. attention to the effect produced by the "mensetic gloom; his very words are (supra) "the gloom of a convent-Mason's reference to what he calls Johnson's "superfil-

Mason's reservance to what he cause continues a tious turn" is in very bad tasts. Prior, from whom Savage says Pope thus derived his hint, was one of the warmest culogists of the poem:

"O Abelardi ill-fated youth,
Thy tale will justify this truth;
But well I weet, thy oruel wrong
Adorns a nobler poet's song:
Dan Pope, for thy misfortune grieved,
With kind concern and skill has weaved
A sliken web; and ne'er shall fade
Its colours; gently has he laid
The mantie o'er thy sad distress,
And Venus shall the texture bless," &c.
Alma, Canto II.

"The harmony of numbers in this poem is very fine. It is rather drawn out to too tedious a length, although the passions vary with great judgment. It may be considered as superfor to any thing in the opistolary way; and the many translations which have been made of it into the modern languages are in some measure a proof of this."—Goldentie: Works, by Cunninglam iii. 438.

which have been made of it into the modern languages are in some measure a proof of this."—Goldenth: Works, by Cunningham, iii, 436,

"It is fine as a poem; it is finer as a piece of high-wrought sloquence. No woman could be supposed to write a better loveletter in verse. Besides the richness of the historical materials, the high gualo of the original sontiments which Pope had to work upon, there were perhaps circumstances in his own situation which made him enter into the subject with even more thun a poet's feeling. The toars shed are drops gushing from the heart; the words are burning sighs breathed from the soul of love. Perhaps the poem to which it bears the greatest similarity in our language is Dryden's Tancred and Signanunda, taken from Boccaccio, Pope's Eloisa will bear this comparison; and after such a test, with Boccaccio for the original author and Dryden for the translator, it need shrink from no other."— Hustit's Lects. on the Eng. Poets, Loct. IV.

"The self-conflict—the flux and reflux of the poor agitafed heart—the spectacle of Eloisa now bending penitentially before the shadowy nusterities of a monastic future, now raving upon the remembrances of the guilty past—one moment reconciled by the very anguish of her soul to the grandeurs of religion and of prostrate adoration, the next moment revolting to perilous retrospects of her treacherous happiness—the recognition by shining gleams, through the very storm and darkness evoked by her earthly sensibilities, of a sensibility deeper far in its ground, and that trembled towards holier objects—the lyrical tumult of the changes, the hope, the toars, the rapture, the penitence, the deepair—place the reader in tumultuous sympathy with the poor, distracted nun."—De Quiver: Essays on the Poets, 163. "The Duncial."

THE DUNCIAD.

For the history of the Dunciad we refer the reader to Pope's Dedication of the poem to Lord Middlesex, (written in the name of Savage,) and the Prolegomena of Scriblerus, the Hypercritics of Aristarchus, and Notes Variorum, which preface and accompany the toxt. As we have seen on a preceding page, whilst the first three Books were first pub. in 1728, the Fourth Book was not added until 1741; and Warton thought it so unequally yoked with its predecessors that in his edit, of Pope's works he published the first three books separately, in the Appendix. De Quincey calls the First Book "by Mar the most brilliant and the weightiest of his works." evc. Brit.

It was in the edition of 1743 that Theobald was dethroned and Cibber reigned in his stead. The want of wisdom displayed in these coronations has been already animadverted upon on a preceding page. (See Cissus, Colley.) Mr. Cibber, a man had in great reputation among the wits for his quickness of parts, had in 1740 pub. an Apology for his Life; in 1742 he paid his compliments to the author of the Dunciad, in his Letter from Mr. Cibber to Mr. Pope, inquiring into the Motives that might induce him, in his Satirical Works, to be so frequently fond of Mr. Cibber's Name, (8vo; 2d ed., same year;) in 1744 he recognized his installation by Another Occasional Letter from Mr. Cibber to Mr. Pope, wherein the New Hero's Preferment to his Throne in the Dundad the New Preface, and Advisor in the curious Improve-the New Preface, and Advisor in the curious Improvements of that Satire, 8vo. The command of a battery so formidable gave Warburton a great advantage in his literary skirmishes.

"I thought," says Lowth, "you might possibly whip me at the cart's tail in a note in the 'Divine Legation,' the ordinary place of your literary execution; or pillory me in the 'Duneled,' another engine which, as legal proprietor, you have very larged alouely and judiciously applied to the same purpose; or perhaps have ordered me a kind of Bridewall correction, by one of your beadles, in a pamphiet,"—Loudh's Letter to Warburton, 1786 8vo. 4.

"No one," says Richardson, "was ever more truder and sore to railiery than Pope, who was so great a master of it, nor consequently more recentful: too strong a proof of this was his long affair with Colley Cibber."—Richardsoniene, 1776, 8vo, 311.

But let us look a little into the plan and execution of this famous satire:

this famous satire:

"Of 'The Dunchd,' the hint is confessedly taken from Dryden's 'MncFlecknoe,' but the plan is so enlarged and diversified as justly to claim the praise of an original, and affords perhaps the best specimen that has yet appeared of personal satire ludicrously pompous. . . The beauties of this poem are well known; its chief fault is the grossness of its images. Pope and Swift had an unnatural delight in ideas physically impure, such as every car shrinks from the mention. But even this fault, offensive as it is, may be forgiven for the excellence of other passages, such as the formation and dissolution of Moore, the account of the Traveller, the misfortune of the Florist, and the crowded thoughts and stately numbers which have been made in 'The Dunciad,' not always for the better, require that it should be published, as in the present collection, with all its varieties. . . If it had been possible for those who were attacked to conceal their pain and their resentment, 'The Dunciad' might have made its way very slowly in the world."—Johnson: Life of Impe, 84, 130, 131.

"There is a general outery against that part of the poem which is thought an abuse on the Duke of Chandos. Other parts are quarrelled with as obscure and inharmonous; and I am told there is an advertisement that promises a publication of Mr. Pope's Epizite versified. . . I am surprised Mr. Pope is not weary of making enemies."—Ir. Delany to Nir Thomas Hummer, 23d Inc. 1731: Hammer's Corresp., 217.

"He [Dryden] died, nevertheless, in a good old age, possessed of the kingdom of Wit, and was succeeded by King Alexander, surnamed Pope. This prince enjoyed the crown many years, and is thought to have stretched the prerogative much farther than his predecessor. De Quincey considers the Dunciad as worthy of "the everlasting admiration of posterity, the very greatest of Pope's works; a monument of satirical power the greatest which man has produced, not excepting the Mac Fleeknes of Dryden.

... With all its defects of plan, the poem, [Book the Fourth,] as to execution, is superior to all which Pope has done; the composition is much superior to-that of the E-say on Man, and more profoundly poetle. The parodles drawn from Milton, as also in the former books, have a beauty and effect which cannot be expressed."—Escye. Brit.

""The Dunciad" is themished by the offensive images of the games; but the poetry appears to me admirable; and though the fourth book has obscurities. I prefer it to the three others: it has descriptions not surpassed by any poet that ever existed, and which surely a writer merely ingenious will never equal. The lines on Italy, on Venice, on Convents, have all the grace for which I contend as distinct from poetry, though united with the same beautiful."—Horace Walpote to J. Boswell is honest enough to quote a remark of his great preceptor which does not place the pupil and nurrator in the most dignified position:

"Johnson... repeated to us, the is forcible, melodious manner, the concluding lines of the Dunciad. While he was talking

On another occasion Johnson suggested that Boswell had lost his chance of immortality by not having flourished in the days of the Dunoisd. See Boswell, by Croker, ed. 1848, r. 8vo, 203.

An eminent critic of our day thus refers to one of his favourite passages in the Dunciad:
"It is remarkable that Mr. Campbell, in selecting proofs from Pope, (whom he most justly defends from all the puny attacks of taste vitlated by theory, and judgment perverted by paradox,) should, to show his power of pictureque description, have omitted the finest example of all, the Italy in his 'Dunciad:'

8. An Essay on Man

8. An Essay on Man.

That the germ of this poem was supplied by Lord Bolingbroke is not to be doubted:
"In the year 1763, being at London, I was carried by Dr. John Blair, prehendary of Westminster, to dine at old Lord Ballurst's, where we found the late Mr. Mallet, Sir James Porter, &c. The conversation turning on Mr. Pope, Lord Bathurst told us that the Essay on Man' was originally composed by Lord Bolingbroke in prose, and that Mr. Pope did no more than put it into verse; that he had read Lord Bolingbroke's manuscript in his own handwriting, and remembered well that he was at a loss whether most to admire the elegance of Lord Bolingbroke's prose or the beauty of Mr. Pope's verse. When Lord Bathurst told this, Mr. Mallet bade me attend, and remember this remarkable piece of information, as by the course of nature I might survive his Lordship and be a witness of his having said so."—Dr. Hugh Blatr to Bosnell, Sept. 21, 1779.
"In the conclusion 'Come then, my friend !'] It is sufficiently acknowledged that the doctrine of the 'Essay on Man' was received from Bolingbroke. ... The 'Essay' plainly appears the fabric of a poet: what Bolingbroke supplied could be only the first principles; the order, illustration, and embellishments must all be Pope's."—Journeys. Life of Pope, 67.

"But truly I had not the least thought of stealing applause by suppressing my name to that Essay. I wanted only to hear truth, and was more afraid of my partial friends than enmiss."

—Fige to Mr. Duncombe, 20th Oct. 1734.

He certainly sought to elicit the "truth:"

"Pray what is your opinion of it? I hear some cry it ex-tremely up, others think it obscure in part, and some (of whom I am sure you are not one) have said it is mine. I think I could show you some faults in it, and believe you can show me more: upon the whole, it is allowed to have merit, and I think so my-self."—Pope to Richardson Senior.

At least in one memorable instance Pope heard an

nonest opinion on the subject:

"About this time Pope, whom he [Mallet] visited familiarly, published his 'Essay on Man,' but concealed the author, and when Mallet entered one day, Pope asked him slightly what there was new. Mallet told him that the newest plece was something called an 'Essay on Man,' which he had inspected idly, and, seeing the utter inability of the author, who had neither skill in writing nor knowledge of his subject, had tossed it away. Pope, to panish his self-conect, told him the secret."—Johnson's Life of Mallet.

of Mailet.
"I glose verse, and evens'hyme," says Pope, "for two reasons.
The one will appear obvious; that principles, maxims, or precepts, so written, both strike the reader more strongty at first, and are more easily retained by him afterwards. The other may seem odd, but it is true. I found I could express them more shortly this way than in proceed itself; and nothing is more easily retain than that much of the force, as well as the great, of arguments or instructions, depends on their concisences."—Prof. in Essay on Man.

Crousaz in his Examination of Mr. Pope's Essay on Man, 1739, 8vo. But Pope found his ablest ally in an ancient enemy: William Warburton, who had supplied some of the best notes to Theobald's edition of Shukspeare, pub. in opposition to Pope's essay in that line,—who had charged Pope with borrowing the labours of others for want of genius to produce something equally good,— now took up the cudgels in defence of the object of his late hostility, and carried the war into Africa by undertaking to prove not only that the Essay was not inimical to the cause of religion, but, on the contrary, was a laboured and systematic defence of truths most important to the welfare of man. His Letters to this effect, originally contributed in 1739 to the Republic of Letters and The Works of the Learned, were pub. in a collective form in 1740, 12mo, under the title of A Vindication of Mr. Popo's Essay on Man, by the Author of the Divine Legation; and in 1742, 8vo, he gave to the world A Critical and Philosophical Commentary on Mr. Pope's Essay on Man; in which is contained a Vindication of the said Essay from the Misrepresentations of Mr. De Rasnel the French Translater, and Mr. De Crousez. and to the welfare of man. His Letters to this effect, Resnel, the French Translator, and Mr. De Crousaz. . . the Commentator, 1742, 8vo.

Pope received his champion with open arms.

"I know I meant just what you explain," he writes to him, in acknowledgment of his Letters; "but I did not explain my own meaning as well as you. You understand me as well as I do myself; but you express me better than I could express myself."—April 11, 1739.

But Richardson the younger tells a very different tale: "Warburton's Discovery of the 'regularity' of Pope's Essay on Criticism, and the whole scheme of his Essay on Man, I happen to knew to be mere about retinement in creating comformities, and this from Pope himself, though he saw fit to adopt them afterwards. . . I know that he never dreamed of the scheme he afterwards adopted; but he had taken teror about the olergy, and Warburton himself, at the general alarm of its fatalism and delatical tendency, of which my father and I talked with him frequently at Twickenham, without his appearing to undorstand it, or ever thinking to alter those passages which we suggested."—Richardsoniana, 261.

"The positions which he transmitted from Bolingbroke," says Johnson, "he seems not to have undorstood, and was pleased with an interpretation that made them orthodox."—Life of Pope, 100.

ppc, 109. Dugald Stowart remarks that "The author of the Essay on Man, from a want of precision in his metaphysical ideas, has unconsciously fallen into various expressions, equally inconsistent with each other and with his own arowed opinions," and cites passages in illustration.

Referring also to Pope's supposed "secret stab at Newton and Clarko" in the Dunciad,

Mr. Stewart continues :

Mr. Stowart continues:

Mr. Stewart quotes the lines of the historian of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire:

Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire:

"The poverty of human language, and the obscurity of human ideas, make it difficult to speak worthily of the Great First Cause; and our most religious poets, (particularly Pope and Thomson,) in striving to express the presence and energy of the Deity in every part of the universe, deviate unwarily into images which require a favourable construction. But those writers deserve that favour by the sublines manner in which they celebrate the Great Father of the universe, and by those effusions of love and grattands which are inconsistent with the materialist's gathern.—Gisson: Miscall. Works, it, 509, 510.

"The 'Breay on Man' was a work of great fabour and long consideration, but certainly not the happiest of Popo's performances. The subject is perhaps not very proper for poetry, and the spect was not sufficiently insater of his subject. Metaphysical morality was to him a new study; he was proud of his acquisition, and, supposing himself master of great secrets, was in hases to teach what he had learned. . . . The vigorous conti-tion of some thoughts, the luxuriant amplification of others, th hase to teach what he had learned... The vigorous contrition of some thoughts, the luxuriant applification of others, the incidental illustrations, and sometimes the dignity, sometimes the softness, of the verses, eachain philosophy, suspend criticism, and oppress judgment by overpowering pleasure. This is true of many paragraphs; yet, if I had undertaken to exemplify Pope's felicity of composition before a rigid critic, I should not select the 'Essay on Man,' for it contains mere lines unnecessarily laboured, more harshness of diction, more thoughts imperfectly expressed, more levity without elegance, and more heavitiess without strength, than will easily be found in all his othe.

"The Evsay on Man is not Pope's best work. . . . 'He spins the thread of his verbosity finer than the staple of his argument.' Cortainly it is sonly fair to allow Pops to speak for him.

Certainly it is only fair to allow Pope to speak for him-self respecting the theology of his poem. He writes to Racine,—and the letter is of peculiar value as the deliberate expression of his religious sentiments in general,—

"J'ai reçu enfin votre poeme sur la religion; le plaisir qui me causa cetto lecture cût été sans mélange si je n'avois eu le chagrin de voir que vous m'imputicz des principes que j'abhorre, Je puis vous assurer, Monz, que votre entière ignorance de notre langue m'a été beaucoup moins fatale, que la connoissance mparfaite qu'en avocut mes traductures, qui les a empêchés de pénérer mes véritables sentimens. I have read both carefully so tar, and written remarks as I went along, and I think I can prove that where Pope has omitted one leanty he has added or improved four. "It is certainly," a., ys Johnson, "the moblest version of poetry which the world has ever seen; and its publication must therefore be considered as one of the great events in the annals of learning. . . . The chief help of Pope in this arduous andertaking was drawn from the versions of Dryden. Virgif had borrowed much of his imagery from Homor; and part of the debt was now paid by his translator. Pope searched the pages of Dryden for happy combinations of heroic diction; but it will not be denied that he added much to what he found. He cultivated our language with so much diligence and art that he has left in his Homer a treasure of pretical elegance to posterity. His version may be said to have tuned the English tongue; for since its appearance no writer, however deficient in other powers, has wanted melody. Buch a series of lines, so claborately corrected and so sweetly medulated, took possession of the public ear; the valgar was enamoured of the poem, and the learned wondered at the translation. . . It is remarked by Waits that there is scarcely a happy combination of words, or a phrase poetically elegant; in the English language, which Pope has not inserted into his version of Homer. How he obtained possession of so many besutios of speech, it word desirable to know. . . But in the most general applicated discordant volces will aways be heard. many beauties of speech, it wore desirable to know. . . . But in the most general applicated discordant voices will always be heard. It has been objected by some, who wish to be numbered among the some of learning, that Pope's version of Homer is not Homerical; that it exhibits no resemblance of the original and characteristic manner of the father of poetry, as it wants his awful simplicity, his artiess grandeur, his nunffected majesty. This examot be totally denied; but it must be remembered that necessive quad cogit defendit,—that may be lawfully done which cannot be forborne. . . Homer doubtless owes to his translation many Ordilan graces not exactly suitable to his character; but to have added can be no great crime, if nothing be taken away. Elegance is surely to be desired, if it be not gained at the expense of dignity. A here would wish to be loved as well as to be reverenced. "—Johnson's Lefe of Pape, 31, 127, 128, 137.

They can have no conception of his manner, who are acquainted with him in Mr. Popo's translation only. An excellent poetical performance that translation is, and faithful in the main to the original. In some places it may be thought to have even improved Homer. It has certainly softened some of his rulenesses, and added delicacy and grace to some of his sentiments. But, withat, it is no other than Homer modernised. In the midst of the elegance and luxuriancy of Mr. Pope's lauguage, we lose sight of the old bard's simplicity. 10. Pope's Versification.

Our author's poetical education commenced in early youth and under parental instruction:

youth and under parental instruction:

"Mr. Popo's father (who was an honest merchant, and dealt in Hollands wholesale) was no poet, but he used to set him to make English verses when very young. He was pretty difficult in being pleased, and used often to send him back to new-turn them. 'These are not good rhymes;' for that was my husband's word for verses."—Mr. Fope's Mother: Spence's Anecdotes, by

He profited by his lessons:

"In versification," he remarked, " there is a sensible difference between softness and sweetness, that I could distinguish from a between softeness and weekines, and I could estimate in the boy."—Bid.

"At fifteen years of age," he tells us, "I got acquainted with Mr. Walsh. He encouraged me much, and used to tell me that there was one way left of excelling; for, though we have several great poets, we never had any one great poet that was correct. He enled his remarks by desiring me to make accuracy my study and aim." See the conclusion of the Essay on Criticism. Dryden admits this general want of correctness.

Dryden admits this general want of correctness.

"It is enough for those who make poetry the business of their lives to learn that correct, vet. excepting Virgil, I never met with any which was so in any language."—Dryden's Defence of the Essay on Dramatic Poetry.

"Mr Pope wrote verses imitative of sounds so early as in this epic poem, [Alcander, "commenced a little after I was twelve."]

'Shields, helms, and swords all jangle as they hang,
And sound formidinous with angry clang,'
was a couplet of this nature in it."—Speace, by Singer.

"Homer is perpetually applying the sound to the sense. This, indeed, is one of the most exquisite beauties of poetry, and attainable by very few. I know only of Homer eminent for it in the treek, and Virgil in Latin. I am sensible it is what may sometimes happen by chance, when a writer is warm and fully possest of his image; however, it may reasonably be believed they designed this, in whose verses it so manifestly appears in a superior degree to all others. Few readers have the ears to be judges of it; but those who have will see I have endeavoured at this beauty."—Pors: Tref. to Homer.

See Johnson's remarks on this subject in the Rambler,

See Johnson's remarks on this subject in the Rambler.

'I learned versification wholly from Dryden's works, who had improved it much beyond any of our former poets, and would, probably, have brought it to perfection, had not he been unhappily obliged to write so often in haste."—Pors: Sprace, by Singer.

Yet Pope's most successful poems were written with

"The things that I have written fastest have always pleased the most. I wrote the Essay on Criticism fast, for I had digested all the matter in prose before I began upon it in verse. The Rape of the Lock was written fast, all the machinery was added afterwards; and the making that, and what was published before, hit so well together, is, I think, one of the greatest proofs of judgment of anything I ever did. I wrote most of the Iliad fast, a great deal of it on journeys, from the pocket-Homer on that shelf there, and often forty or fifty verses in a morning in bod. The Dunciad cost me as much pains as any thing I therefore, "—Ibid.

But he talls us in other places.

Correctness in soon attained. In the Freinos to the Pastorals, written at sixteen, we are told, "Notwithstanding the early time of their production, the autor esteemed these as the most correct in the versification, and musical in the numbers, of all his works. . . . In a letter of his to Mr. Walsh about this time, we find an enumeration of several nicelies in versification, which portage have never been strictly observed in any English poem except in these Pastorals."

Lord Lansdowne, in a letter written when Pope was about seventeen, remarks,

"If he goes on as he has begun in his Pastoral way, as Virgit

first tried his strangth, we may hope to see English poetry vis

And Walsh, whom Dryden calls the best critic of his age, writes to Wycherley in July, 1705, four years before the Pastorals were printed,

"It is not flattery at all to say that Virgil had written nothing so good at his age." See notice of the Pastorals, (cute.)

Among early eulogies of Pope's versification are the following:

lowing:
The true, if finest notes alone could show
(Tuned justly high, or regularly low)
That we should fame to these mere vocale give,
Pope more than we can offer should receive;
For when some gliding river is his thome,
His lines run smoother than the smoothest stream," &c.
H. STANHOPS: Progress of Dulness, 1729, 12me.

Thomas Cooke, who treated Pope's Homer with little spect, (see p. 422, supra,) in his strictures on the translator thus does justice to his merits as a poot:

"But in his other works what beauties thine,
While sweetest music dwells on every line!
These he admired, on these he stamped his praise,
And bade them live to brighten future days,"

Battle of the I bets, 1725, fol. 15.

But Dennis professes no such admiration for the mo-notonous excellence:

"Boileau's Pegusus has all his paces; the Pegasus of Pope, like a Kentish post-horse, is always upon the Canterbury."—Re-marks upon several Passayes in the Preliminaries to the Dunciad,

"He used almost always the same fabric of verse; and, indeed, by those few essays which he made of any other, he did not enlarge his reputation. Liou Hiva: Fout of the Poets.

"Considering the quantity he has written, we should think him infortunate in the selection of his verse, did we not also consider the nature of his subjects. These, being for the most put satircal or argumentative, were no doubt better managed in rhyme, which, pointed, antithotical, sententions in its stucture, gave additional keenness to his raillery and force to his argument. Shackled as this kind of verse is by its own laws, in which respect it resembles the French monotony in wire more than any other, we still think Pope has not relieved it by all the variety of which it is so succeptible. Every line with him seems to 'hangesel-balanced on its own centre,' every pause is distributed by one uniform rule, every couplet shoots up its own seatence. This is artificad, not natural, harmony, and the ear soon becomes wearied with such a regular recurrence of sounds and pauses."—Wix. II. Prescort: N. Amer. Rev., Oct. 1821, 471–472.

Exquisite in the sweet rising and falling of its clauses, it seldom or never takes the ear prisoner by a musical surprise. If Pope be the nightingale of our vorse, he displays none of the irregular and unexperted gush of the sangeter. He has no variationa. The time is delicate, but not natural. It remnis us of a bird, all over brilliant, which pipes its one lay in a golden cage and has forgoften the green wood in the luxury of confinement. But Dryden's versification has the freedom and the freshness of the fields. Pope's modulation is of the car; Dryden's, of the subject."—Rev. R. A. Willmott: Pleasurea, dc. of Lit., ed. 1806, 79.

"Like other mechanical arts, it was gradually improved by means of many experiments and many failures. It was reserved for Pope to discover the trick, to make himself complete mater of it, and to teach it to everythody else. From the time when his Pastorals appeared, heroic versification became matter of puls and compass, and, before long, all artists were on a level.

Eundreds of dunces who never blundered on one happy thought or expression were able to write reams of couplets, which, as far as enphony was concerned, could not be distinguished from those of Pops himself, and which very clever writers of the reign of Charles the Second—Rochestor, for example, or Marvell, or Oldsham—would have contemplated with admiring despair."—Cvil. and Histor. "Pope gave our heroic couplet its strictest melody and tersest expression. D'un mot said en an place il rineique le poneroir. If his contemporaries forgot other poets in admiring lim, let him not be robbed of his just fame on pretence that a part of it was superfluous. The public car was long fatigued with repetitions of his manner; but if we place ourselves in the struction of those to whom his brillancy, succinctness, and animation were wholly new, we cannot wonder at their being captivated to the footest admiration. In order to do justice to Pope, we should forget his imitators, if that were possible; but it is easier to reniember than to forget by an effort,—to acquire associations than to shake them off. Kvery one may recollect how often the most beautiful air has palled upon his ear, and grown insipid, from being played or sung by vulgar musicians. It is the same thing with regard to Pope's versification. That his peculiar rhythm and manner are the very bost in the whole range of our poetry need not be asserted. He has a gracefully peculiar manner, though it is not calculated to be an universal one; and where, indeed, shall we find the style of poetry that could be pronounced an exclusive model for every composer? His pauses have little variety, and his phrases are too much weighed in the balance of antithesis. But let us look to the sprift that points his antithesis, and to the rapid precision of his thoughts, and we shall forgive him for the limital Picts. the British I'vets.

Hazlitt does not share in the general enthusiasm on this subject:

this subject:

"His excellence is by no means faultlessness. If he had no great faults, he is full of little errors. His grammatical construction is often lame and imperfect. . . . Pope's rhymes are constantly defective, being rhymes to the eye instead of the ear; and this to a greater degree not only than in later but than in preceding writers. The praise of his verkification must be confined to its uniform amoothpess and harmony. In the translation of the Hind, which has been considered as his master-place in style and execution, he continually changes the tenses in the same sentence for the purpose of rhyme, which shows either a want of technical resources, or great inattention to punctilious exactness."—Lecks, on the Eng. Puels, Lect. IV.

11. Pope's General Merits as a Poet. Would that we had space for Johnson's admirable comparison between Pope and Dryden !- but this must be enjoyed by the reader in the original, whilst we are forced to content ourselves with the citation of a few lines from the conclusion of the biography:

lines from the conclusion of the biography:

"Pope had, in proportions very nicely adjusted to each other, all the qualities that constitute genius. He had Invention, by which new trains of events are torned and new scenes of inagery displayed, as in 'The Hape of the Lock,' and by which extrinsic and adventitious embelishments and illustrations are connected with a known subject, as in the 'Essay on Criticism.' He had Inagrimation, which strongly impresses the writer's mind, and enables him to convey to the reader the various forms of nature, incidents of life, and energies of passion, as in his 'Bioles,' 'Windsor Forest,' and the 'Ethic Episites.' He had Judgment, which selects from life or nature what the present purpose requires, and by separating the essence of things from its con comitants, often makes the representation more powerful than the reality; and he had colours of language always before him, ready to decerate his matter with every grace of elegant expression, as when he accommodates his diction to the wonderful simplicity of Homore's sentiments and descriptions."—Johnson: Life of Impe, 135.

simplicity of Homer's sentiments and descriptions."—Johnson: Life of Itpe, 135.
"Johnson said his characters of men were admirably drawn; those of women not so well."—Borvell, by Croker, ed. 1848, 203.
"When Johnson had finished his preface to Shakapeage, Mr. Thrale said, 'Oh, sir, you have driven Pope quite into the shade.'
'I fear not, sir,' was our dector's reply: 'the life fellow has done wonders.'"—Mrs. Thrale's sade, in her copy of Johnson's Lives: quoted in Cat. of W. II. Burton's Library, N. York, 1800, 198.

"I am bound to acquiesce in Johnson's opinion of Pope, because it has always been my own. I could never agree with those who preferred him to Dryden; nor with others (I have known such, and persons of taste and discernment too) who could not allow him to be a poet at all. He was certainly a mechanical maker of varsee, and in every line he wrote we see indubitable marks of the most indefinitiable industry and labour. indubitable marks of the most indefitigable industry and labour. Writers who find it necessary to make strenuous and painful exertions are generally as phlegmatic as they are correct; but Pope was in this respect exempted from the common lot of authors of that class. With the unwarded application of a plodding Flemish painter, who draws a shrimp with the most minute exactness, he had all the gonins of one of the first masters. Never, I believe, were such talents and such drudgery united. But I admire bryden most, who has succeeded by mere dist of genius, and in spite of a laziness and carelesness almost peculiar to himself. His faults are numberless, but so are his beauties. His faults are hose of a great man, and his beauties are such (at least sometimes) as Pope, with all his touching and retouching, could never equal. "Fra: Letter to Uswin, Lors. & 1782, "He [Johnson] observed that in Dryden's poetry there wave passages drawn from a profundity which Pope could never reach."—Horseell, by Croker, 262.

"The school of Dryden and Pope, which prevailed till a very late period of the last century, is neither the most poetical nor the most astional part of our literary amasis. These great poets sometimes indeed ventured into the regions of pure poetry; but their general character is, that 'not in fancy's mass they wandered long,' and that they rather approached the elegant correctness of our Continental neighbours, than supported the daring flight which in the former age had borne English poetry to a sublime elevation than that of any other modern people of the West."—Bit J. Mackintosn: Works, ed. 1854, ii. 604-508.

"We criticised Pope's lines 'On an Unfortunate Lady.' He [Str J. Mackintosn') would not allow that they were cold, which I thought they were, repeating 'By Liveign hands,' Le., and adding, 'Surely these are not cold.' He was much moved in repeating them."—Life of Nir J. Mackintosh', in, chap. til.

"Shall I venture to own to you that in mental power I give him only the third place among the wits of his time? In talent, that is, in power formed and directed by habit to one sort of exertion, he place may be higher. He had a greater talent for brilliant and sententions verse than perhaps any of his contemporaries had for any other kind of literary excellence. I really think that his great merit is the same with that of a writer of maxims. His observations on life are both sensible and fine, but they are seidom his own; they have not the truth of immediate experience; and in his maxims, like that of his brethren, the truth is always in part saccilised to the brilliancy; some part of the jewel is cut away in pullshing. A talent very inferior to a man's general power of mind, especially when joined to mannerism, strikes me as a soit of knack. Estimated by the two great faculties of the human mind, his place must be where I have assigned it. Swift was as much alove him in meteranding, as Addison in imagination—not to m

"Where, then, according to the question proposed at the beginning of this Essay, shall we with justice be authorized to place our admired Pope! Not, assuredly, in the same rank with Sprace, Shakspare, and Millon; however justiy we may appland the Eleisa and Rope of the Lock. But, conditering the correctness, eleganee, and utility of his works, the weight of sentiment and the knowledge of man they centum, we may venture to assign him a place next to Milton, and just above Prodon. Yet, to bring our minds attendly to make this decision, we must forget for a moneut the divine Minde Off of Bryden, and may perhaps then be compelled to confess that, though Irigides be the greater genius, yet Pope is the better attist.

"The preference here given to Pope above other modern English poets, it must be remembered, is founded on the excellencies of his works in general, and taken all tagether: for there are parts and passages in other modern authors—in Fromy and in Thomes, for instance—equal to any of Pope; and he has written nothing in a strain so truly sublime as the Rord of Gray."

"What rank should be assigned to Pope in a classification of one English poets, has been a subject of frequent inquiry. It is evident that by far the greater part of his original preductions consists of eithe and satirre poetry; and by those who estimate mero moral sentiment, or the expessive, in splendid versification of fashionable vice or folly, as the highest principle of the art, he must be considered as the first of tearls. But we have just written the name of Byron; and who has ever equalled his lordship in his admiration of the Bard of Twickenham?

"Ho is the moral poet of all civilization!" exclaims his noble eulogist, "and, as such, let us hope that he will one day be the national poet of all mankind. He is the only poet that never shocks; the only poet whose faulliesmess has been made his reproach. Cast your eye over his productions; consider their extent, and contemplate their variety,—pasteral, passion, mockherole, translation, satire, ethes,—all excellent, and often perfect. If his great charm be his metody, how comes it that foreigners adote him, even in their diducted translations?"—Letter to  [John Marray] on the Rev. W. L. Bowles's Strictures on the Life and Writings of Pope, 1821.

"Neither time, nor distance, nor grief, nor age, can ever dimi-nish my veneration for him, who is the great moral poet of all times, of all climes, of all feelings, and of all stages of existence. The delight of my boyhood, the study of my manhood, perlups (if allowed to me to attain it) he may be the consolation of my age. His poerry is the Book of Line. Without canting, and yet without neglecting religion, he has assembled all that a good without neglecting religion, he has assembled all that a good and great man can gather together of moral wesdem clothed in consummate beauty. . . Such 'a poet of a thousand years' was Pope. A thousand years will roll away before such another can be hoped for in our literature. But it can want them; he himself is a literature. 13. Pope's Merits as a Letter-Writer.

The history of the publication of Pope's letters has been sufficiently noticed on a preceding page. It was not to be supposed that a point so vulnerable,—the expo-sition of private letters,—even had the munner of promulgation been unquestionable, would be neglected by the satirist's fair but bitter enemy. Fifteen years after the publication of Pope's acknowledged quarto, (1737,) sho writes to a friend,

"There cannot be a stronger proof of his [Pope's] being capable of any action for the sake of gain than publishing his literacy correspondence, which have open such a mixtue of dulness and ingenuity that one would imagine it visible even to his most passionate admirers."—Lady M. W. Montagu to the Counters of Inte, June 23, 1752.

the convert's own assertion they transformed a more powerful foe into a friend:

"Of his social qualities, if an estimate be made from his Letters, an opinion to favourathe cannot easily be formed; they exhibit a perpetual and unclouded effulgence of general hences allegene and particular forthers. There is nothing but liberality, gratitude, constancy, and tenderness. . . . If the Letters of Pups are considered merely as compositions, they seem to be premediated and artful. . . . Pope may be said to write always with his reputation in his head; Swift, perhaps, like a man who remembered that he was writing to Pope; but Arbutnot, like one who lets his thoughts drop from his pen as they rise into his mind. . . In the Letters both of Swift and Pope there appears such narrowness of mind as makes them insensible of any excellence that has not some affinity with their own, and confines their esteem and approbation to so small a number, that whoever should form his opinion of the age from their representation, would suppose them to have lived amidst ignorance and barbarity, unable to find among their contemporaries either virtue or intelligence, and perrect"-d by those that cond not understand them."—Joneson: Life of Pope, 64, 103, 104, 107.

"In all his lotters, as well as in those of Swift, there runs a strain of pride, as if the world talked of nothing but themselves."—Glollowitz: Life of Nach.

The collection is, on the whole, an entertaining and agreeable one, and contains much wit and refinement. . . The consume of writing letters in too artificial a manner falls heaviest on Mr. Pope himself. Both Guidsmith and Scott meditated lives of Popa and editions of his works. Would that they had carried out their good resolutions! The following curious ancedote we think well worthy of quotation;

we think well worthy of quotation:

"By one of those acts which neither science nor curiosity can excuse, the skull of Pope is now in the private collection of a phrenologist. The manner in which it was obtained is said to have been this. On some occision of alteration in the charch, or burnel of some one in the same spot, the coffin of Popo was divinterred, and opened to see the state of the tennains; by a britle to the sextion of the time, powersion of the skull was obtained for the night, and another skull returned instead of it. I have heard that fifty jounds were just to manage and carry through this transaction. Be that as it may the skull of Pope figures in a private museum'——Hourd's Himms and Haunts of the Most Emment British Lods: Pape.

We may annionizately conclude our life of this great

We may appropriately conclude our life of this great poet by the citation of some lines on his character as a man and an author, by one of his distinguished asso-

oiates:

ciates:

"If we may judge of him by his works, his chief aim was to be esteemed a man of virtue. His litters are written in that style, his list volumes are all of the moral kind; he has avoided trifles, and consequently his escaped a rock which has proved very injurious to Dr. Swift's reputation. He has given his imagination full scope, and yet has preserved a perpetual guard upon his conduct. The constitution of his body and mind might really incline him to the habits of caution and reserve. The treatment which he met with afterwards, from an innumerabla tribe of adversaries, confirmed this habit, and made him slower than the he in in pronouncing his judgment upon persons and things. His poss writings are little less harmonious than his versa, and his voice, in common conversation, was so not nell hims of the little mightingale. His manners were delicate, casy, and engaging, and he treated his friends with a politicness that the mind, and age necessity that was much to his honour. Livery guest was made happy within his doors, pleasured will under his toof, and elegance presided at his table."—

Porson, Richard, 1759-1808, a native of East Ruston, Norfolk, where his father was parish clerk, received his early education from Mr. Summers, of Happesburgh, and Mr. Charles Hewitt, Vicar of East Ruston and Bacton, and was, by the kind offices of Mr. Norris, of Witton, placed at Eton on the foundation in 1776.

Mr. Norris died whilst his protégé was at Eton, but his.

place as a benefactor to the youth was supplied by Sir George Baker, M.D., whose attainments as a classical scholar have been commemorated on a preceding page (103) of this Dictionary. In 1777 Porson was admitted under-graduate of Trinity College; in 1781 was elected to a University Scholarship on Lord Craven's foundation. tion; and on his taking his degree of B.A., in 1782, was third senior optime and senior medallist; in October, 1782, became Fellow of his college; in 1785 took the degree of M.A.; in 1790 was made Regius Professor of Greek in the University of Cambridge, (salary £40 per annum;) was deterred from taking orders by scruples respecting subscription to the Thirty-Nine Articles, and therefore, according to rule, vacated his fellowship in 1791; in November, 1795, married Mrs. Lunan, (she survived the marriage about eighteen months,) sister of Mr. Perry of the Morning Chronicle, (super;) in 1806 was appointed Head Librarian of the London Institution, (salary £200 per anum,) established in that year, and died in his rooms in the Old Jowry, September 25, 1808

"While he [Pitt] was in power, the greatest philologist of his age, his own contemporary at Cambridge, was reduced to earn a livelihood by the lowest literary drudgery, and to spend in writing squits for the Morning Chronicle, years to which we might have owed an all-but porfect text of the whole tragic and comic drama of Athena."—Load Macquary: Life of William Pill, in Energe. Brit., 8th ed., xvil., 1859.

That his constitution, which had been much impaired to the propagation of the

by spasmodic asthma, was injured by intemperance, is not to be denied; that he was a habitual drunkard, as often asserted, has been denied on good authority; and the charge is fully disproved by the extent and the charthe charge is unity disproved by the extent and the character of his learned labours. In 1792, about £2000 was voted for his benefit in the funds; and after his death the interest of £400 of this money was devoted to an annual prize still known as the Porson Prize. A vol. entitled the Porson Prize Exercises, 1817-50, was pub. at Cambridge in 1850, p. 8vo; new ed., 1817-56, 1857, p. 8vo. This collection must not be predected by the p. 8vo. This collection must not be neglected by the Young's memoir of Porson, (to which we have been largely indobted in this article,) in Encyc. Brit., 7th ed., (repub., in part, in 8th ed.; and see, also, Young's Works, 1865, vol. iii.,) and the authorities referred to at conclusion of this sletch. sion of this sketch.

5. In Gent. Mag., Oct. and Doc. 1788, Feb., April, May, June, Aug. 1789, Feb. 1790, Letters (xii.) on the Three. Witnesses. The last was repub. in Tracts, xix.; most of the others in the collection of Letters to Mr. Archdescon Travis, in answer to his Defence of the Three Heavenly Witnesses, Lon., 1790, 8vo; 1800, 8vo, To these famous Letters, intended to disprove the authenticity of 1 John v. 7, we have referred on preceding pages, (see Burgess, Thomas, D.D.; English, George B.; Gibbon, Edward, 663; Newton, Sir Isaac, No. 9, 1420; Pern, Granyille, No. 10;) but a few additional quotations on a subject of such interest will readily be excused. Porson's habitual modesty—for modesty was excused. Porson's habitual modesty—for modesty was one of his most strongly marked characteristics—did not prevent the free exposition of his own opinion as to the results of the controversy.

"[Forson] spoke with much complacency of his Letters to Travils, by which he had crushed his opponent and set the quos-tion at rest."—[Green's] Plury of a Lovy of Lit., Gent. Mag., Bec. 1806, $75.

But it has seldom happened to an author to be so well-supported in his natural partiality for his own productions:

"Inimitable and invincible. . . . Trayis was a superficial and arrogant declaimer, and his letters to Gibbon brought down upon him the just and heavy displeasure of an assailant equally irresistible from his wit, his reasoning, and his orndition—I mean the immortal Richard Porson."—Dn. Pars.
"I consider Mr. Porson's answer to Archdeacon Trayis as the most scute and accurate piece of criticism which has appeared since the days of Bentley. His strictures are founded in argument, enriched with learning, and onlivened with wife; and his adversary neither deserves nor finds any quarter at his hands. . . The evidence of the three heavenly witnesses would now be rejected in any court of justice. . . The more learned ecclesiastics will indeed have the secret satisfaction of reprobating in the closet what they read in the church."—Gibson: Miscill. Works, ed. 1837, 103. See, also, 112.
"Porson's Letters to Archdeacon Trayis are conspicuous for their erudition, accuracy, virulence, bitterness, and their erudition, acuteness, accuracy, virulence, bitterness, and invective."—Matrias: Pursuits of Lit., 16th ed., 1812, fol. 135, invective."—MATHLES: Pursuits of Lit., 19th ed., 1912, fol. 130, n. 53. See, also, 100, n., 330, n.

"Displaying uncommon soberness of judgment, keenness of perspleacity, and vigour of argumentation."—UREEN: Diary of a Lover of Lit., 1810, 4to, 213.

"Even the prejudiced reader must now he silenced, at least, by the learned and ingenious Letters of Mr. Porson to Aichdescon Travia."—Edward Evanson.

by the learned and ingenious Letters of Mr. Foresti to Archaese-con Travis."—EDWARD EVARSON.

"They discover the profound learning, predigious acuteness, and elegant wit for which Porson was distinguished above all his contemporaries. . . The spirit of the letters is unchristian; but they are admirable specimens of learning and acute argumentation."—Orme's Ribb. Rib., 380.

The last published notice of the Letters to Travis occurs in the Lectures and Essays on University Subjects issued within the last few weeks (1859) by a learned champion of the Roman Catholic Communion, the Rev. John Henry

Newman, D.D., (see p. 1413, supra:)

"Porson is no edifying companion for young men of eighteen, nor are his letters on the text of the Three Reavenly Witnesses to be recommended; but that does not hinder his being admitted into Catholic schools, while he is confined within the limits of his Preface to the Recuba."

But surely the "limits" are rather restricted: circum-

"These Letters are generally considered, by critics of all par-ties, as finally decisive of a question which had often been agi-tated before, but never so learnedly argued nor so satisfactority discussed in all its bearings."—Thomas Young, M.D.: Memoir of

Porter, Sir Robert Ker, Knt., K.C.H., b. at Dur-ham, 1780, d. suddenly at St. Petersburg, 1842, has already been briefly noticed in our sketches of his sisters, Anna Maria and Jane Porter, (ante.) About 1790 he became a student of the Royal Academy, under the auspieces of Benjamin West; in 1792 commenced his picture of Moses and Aaron for Shoreditch Church; in 1794 presented an altar-piece of Christ allaying the Storm to the Roman Catholic Chapel at Portsea; and in 1798 another, of St. John Preaching in the Wilderness, to St. John's College, Cambridge. He subsequently gained distinction by a number of great paintings,—among which were the battle-pieces of The Storming of Seringapatam, (ex-hibited A.b. 1800.) The Siege of Acre, (with a printed Companion, 1801, Svo,) Agineourt, The Battle of Alex-andria, and The Death of Sir Ralph Abercromby. In 1804 he visited Russia, and was appointed historical painter to the emperor, and gained the affections of the Princess Mary de Sherbatoff, whom he married in 1811, and who survived him. In 1808 he accompanied Sir John Moore's expedition to the Peninsula, and attended the campaign throughout to its melancholy termination at the battle of Corunna. From 1817 to 1820 he was engaged in his travels through the East; in 1819 was created a Knight of the Lion and Sun of Persia, and in 1832 Knight Commander of the Order of Hanover; from 1826 to 1841 was British Consul at Venezuela, residing at Caracas, (where he painted his Christ at the Last Supper, Our Saviour Blessing the Little Child, and Ecce Homo;) on May 3d, 1842, wrote from St. Petersburg of his intended visit to England, and on the next day died

Powell, or Powel, Edward, D.D., a learned R. Catholic divine, Fellow of Oriol College, Oxford, 1495, gained the favour of Henry VIII. by opposing Luther in his Propugnaculum summi Sacerdotii Evangelici, Lon., 1523, 4to, and lost his head by pleading for Catherine in his Tractatus de non Dissolvendo Henrici Regis cum Catherina Matrimonia, Lib. i. His advocacy of the supremacy of the Roman see was indeed one of the reticles on which he was condemned. He was hanged, drawn, and quartered at Smithfield, July 30, 1540, along with Dr. Richard Fetherstone and Dr. Thomas Able: see Arle, or Abril, Thomas. Respecting Powell, see Bliss's Wood's Athen. Power, Robert. Miscellaneous Poems, Lon., 2 vols. p. 8vo.

Power. Thomas. Masonic Melodies, Bost., 1844.

Power, Tyrone, 1795-1841, according to one version, was the son of an Irish gentleman, of the county of Waterford, and whilst still an infant was taken by his widowed mother to her new residence at Glumorganshira. South Wales.

According to another version,

"In point of fact, Power was a native of Swansea, in Wales, where he served his apprenticeship to the printing-business, and did newspaper work in England as a journeyman compositor before he went on the stage. As a printer, his name was Thomas Powell, which he converted to Tyrone Power after he had been for some time on the stage at Newcastle-upon-Tyne."—Amer. Lit. Gaz., Nov. 15, 1806, 49.

At the town of Cardiff, a short distance from his home, young Power found a theatre, and soon "trod the boards" in the character of Romeo, "time out of mind" the débutant's favourite "first character." After mind" the aboutant's lavourite "irst character." After some experience in tragedy, he threw away the dagger and became famous in Irish comedy,—to suit which he manufactured an admirable brogue,—inferior, indeed, to "Irish Johnstone's," which was genuine, but good enough to pass for original. In 1818 he retired from the stage, but returned in 1821; became manager of the Olympic Theatre in 1823, and appeared with no success at Druys Lane in the same year; in 1824 seblaged at at Drury Lane in the same year; in 1824 achieved a triumph as Paddy O'lialloran, and henceforth devoted triumph as Faddy O halloran, and hencelorin devoted himself to Irish characters; travelled in America in 1833, '34, and '35, and pub. his Impressions of America in 2 vols. 8vo in 1836, (repub. in Phila. in same year, 2 vols. 12mo, and commended by Lon. Month. Rev., 1836, i. 297;) made a second tour through the United States in 1840, and sailed from New York for England, March 11, 1841, on board the steam-ship "President:" neither the vessel nor any of the 123 souls on board were ever heard of from that day. Mr. Power also pub. two novels, The King's Sceret, 3 vols. p. 8vo, and Cauth Malowaey, or the Last Heir, 3 vols. p. 8vo; new ed., 1858, 12mo. Among the best-known of Praed's poems are Lillian, The Troubadour, Sohool and School Fellows, Palinodia, The Vicar, Josephine, Arminius, The Red Fisherman, The Bridal of Belmont, Memory, The Belle of the Ball, Time's Changes, Gog, The Legend of the Dracbenfels, The Legend of the Toufel-Haus, The Bachelor, Quince, My Partner, Sir Hilary, and other charades. Miss Mitford cannot say enough in commendation of Praed's pieces:

Praced's pieces:

"That these poems are the most graceful and finished verses of society that can be found in our language, it is impossible to doubt." Recollect, of a Leit. Left.

Mr. Whitmore has proved his admiration of the poet by the pains devoted to his editorial labours, (ut supra.)

by the pains devoted to his editorial labours, (at supra.)
"In conclusion," he romarks, p. 546, "we may say that, whilefew poets have written purer verse than he, few satirists have done their task with more gentleness."
"Praced's fancy was airy, bright, and arabesque. It enabled him, with his easy command of poetical expression, to produce picturesque sketches with equal grace and facility. His proce is simost as quaintly and pensively playful as his verse.
We have little doubt that if his correspondence were selected from, it would display all those qualities that sparkle as gracefully in his published pieges."—Lon. Athem., 1862, 908, 216.

G. Whittier. In resigning it to his fellow-poet, Mr. J. G. Whittier. In 1831 Mr. Prentice became connected with the paper which he has since made so famous,—the Louisville (Daily) Journal. From his editorial chair, which he has now occupied (we write in 1869) for thirty-eight years, Mr. Prentice has kept up an energetic and brillant warfare against his political opponents. It was well ramarked, in a recent publication,

"The 'Prenticeiana' of the editor are famous. If collected and published, with appropriate notes, these mots would form an amazing and instructive commentary on the management of elections, newspaper literature, and political extenty, of permanent value as a memorial of the times."—Pupcfinks: Cyc. of James, Lett., 1858, il. 400.

This hint has not been lost: a collection of Prenticeiana, or Wit and Humour in Paragraphs, in 1 volume 18mo, was pub. in New York in 1859. The announcement of this work in London led to an amusing blunder on the part of the London Bookseller, a monthly organ of the publishers:

But (like the "twofold operation of the good sherris-sack") Mr. Prentice is not only poetical himself, but he is the cause of poetry, as well as of wit, in others: some of the best female writers in the West (the lamented "Amelia" Welby was one of the most popular) have owed their first introduction to the public to the columns of the Louisville Journal. We have already noticed (vide p. 394, supra) Mr. Prentice's blographical sketch of his friend of many years, Henry Clay. (See N. Amer. Rev., Oct. 1831, 351-396, by Alex. H. Everett.)

Prescott, William Hickling, May 4, 1706-Jan.
28, 1859, a son of the late Judge William Prescott, of Boston, and a grandson of Colonel William Prescott, who commanded at Bunker Hill, June 17, 1775, first saw that light at Salary. the light at Salem, Massachusetts, where his father resided between 1789 and 1808. In the latter year Judge Prescott removed to Boston, and William became a scholar of Dr. Gardiner, who had himself been disciplined by the famous pedagogue who lit his torch at Bellenden's heathen altar, beating the inscription De Tribus Luminibus Momanorum. In 1811 young Prescott entered Harvard College,—where his classical predilec-tions and attainments would have elicited the commendation of his literary grandsire, Dr. Parr, himself,-graduated with distinguished honour in 1814, and would at once have devoted himself, under the brightest auspices, to the profession adorned by the learning and reputation of his father, but for the results of one of those thoughtor his father, but for the results of one of those thought-less acts of mischlevous folly the effects of which so often punish the transgressor and his victim, and sometimes embitter the remaining years of a long life. At a col-lege dinner in his Junior year, an under-graduate threw at random a large, hard piece of bread, which struck one of Prescott's eyes, and, for all useful purposes, closed it forever on the world. His other eye was soon sympathe-tically affected; and the youthful student, to whom life had but yesterday seemed so bright and hope-inspiring, was now obliged to turn his back upon the sun and all that it gladdens, and, at a later period, for many weary months to submit to the imprisonment of a darkened

Thus early tried in the furnace of affliction, he was not found unequal to his probation. "In all that trying season," said his mother, "I never groped my way across the apartment to take my place by his side, that he did not greet me with some hearty expression of good cheer, as if we were the patients and it were his place to comfort us."

In the autumn of 1815 he visited Europe, and passed two years in England, France, and Italy, in seeking and gaining instruction both from books and men, and delighting not the less in the charms of nature because by him they could be seen only "as through a gluss, darkly." For this infirmity of vision, indeed, he found no cure; but he returned to his home more in love than ever with the great deeds and great thoughts of the men of renown of the older days, and with a resolute determination that the "ample page of knowledge, rich with the spoils of time," if obscured to his external organs, should be no stranger to his intellectual vision. But no one can tell stranger to his intellectual vision. But no one can tell the story so well as it was related by the student himself, in a letter, written eighteen months before his death, to the Rov. George E. Ellis, and by this gentleman published in the Massachusetts Teacher for July, 1857: "I suppose you are aware that when in college I received an injury in one eye, which deprived me of the use of it for reading and writing. An injury one use of the other syon which the burden of my studies was now wholly thrown, brought on a rheumatic inflammation, which deprived me entirely of sight for some weeks. When this was reasored, the eye remained in soo irritable a state to be employed in reading for several years. I consequently abandoned the study of the law, upon which I had entered; and, as a man must find something to do, I determined to devote myself to letters, in which independent career I could regulate my own houre with reference to what my sight might employ had been a strong passion for historical writing, to which, perhaps, the reading of Gibbon's autobiography contributed not a little. I proposed to make myself a listorian in the beat sense of the torm, and hoped to produce something which posterity would not willingly let die. In a memorandumbook, as far back as the year 1919, I find the desire minated; and I proposed to devote ten years of my life to the study of uncleat and modern literatures,—chiefly the latter,—and to give tag years more to some historical work. I have had the good fortune to accomplish this design pretry nearly within the limits assigned. In the Christines of 1:37 my first work, the History of Ferdinand and Isabella, was given to the public.

"During my preliminary atmics in the field of general literature, my eyes gradually acquired so much strength that I was enabled to twe them many hours of the day. The result of my studies at this time I was in the habit of giving, in the form of sessays, in public journals,—chefly in the North American,—from which a number, quate large enough, have been transferred to a separate volume of Mescalanies. Having settled on a subject for a particular history, I host no time in collecting the materials arrived, my eye had experienced so severe a strain that I enjoyed no use of it again, for reading, for several years. It has, indeed, never since fully recovered its strongth, nor have I ever ventured to use it again, for reading, for several the great distinct of the more provided to be proved. The remarke pla required the more patience; he had not even this result to cheer him in his labour.

"I now felt that the great difficulty could be overcome; and I obtained the services of a reader whose acquaintance with modern and ancient tongues supplied, as far as it could be supplied, the deficiency of eyosight on my part. But, though in this way I could examine various authorities, it was not easy to arrange in my mind the results of my reading, drawn from different and often contradictory accounts. To do this I dictated copious notes as I went along, and, when I had read enough for a chapter,—from thirty to forty, and sometimes fifty, pages in length,—I had a mass of memorands in my own language, which would easily bring before me at one view the fruits of my researches. These notes were carefully read to me; and while my researches. These notes were carefully read to me; and while my researches. These notes were carefully read to me; and while my reconstanted that it may mind. This process I repeated at least half a dozen times, so that when I finally put my pen to paper it run off pretty glibly, for it was an effort of memory rather thag creation. This nethod had the advantage of saving ma from the perploxity of frequently referring to the scattered passages in the originals, and it enabled me to make the corrections in my own mind which are usually made in the manuscript, and which with my mode of writing—as I shall explain—would have much embarrassed me. Yet I must admit that this instead of composition, when the chapter was very long, was somewhat too heavy a strain on the memory to be altogether recommended.

"Writing presented me a difficulty over greater than reading."

was somewhat too heavy a strain on the memory to be altogether resonancembed.

"Writing presented me a difficulty even greater than reading. Thierry, the famous blind historien of the Norman Conquest, advised me to entityste dictation; but I have usually preferred a substitute that I found in a writing-case made for the blind, which I procured in London forty years since. It is a simple apparatus, often described by me for the benefit of persons whose vision is imperfect. It consists of a frame of the also of a sheet of paper, traversed by bruss wires as many as lines are wanted on the page, and with a sheet of carbonated paper, such as is med for getting duplicates, pasted on the reverse side. With an frozy or agate stylus the writer traces his characters between the wires on the carbonated sheet, making indelible marks, which he cannot see, on the white page below. This treadmill operation has its defects; and I have repeatedly supposed I had accompilished a good page, and was proceeding in all the glow of composition to me ahead, when I found I had forgetten to insert a sheet of my writing-case my best friend in my lonely hours, and with it have writen nearly all that I have eent into the world, have writen nearly all that I have eent into the world, the leaf forty years.

The manuscript thus written, and deciphered—for it was is the nature of hieroglyphics—by my secretary, was then read to me for corrections, and copied off in a fair hand for the priger. All this, it may be thought, was rather a slow process, requiring the virtue of patience in all the parties concerned. Bugin time my cycs improved again. Before I had finished 'Fordinand and I-abella,' I could use them some hours every day. And thus they have continued till within a few years, though subject to occasional interruptions, sometimes of weeks, and sometimes of months, when I could not look at a book. And this circumstance, as well as habit,—second nature,—has led me to adhere still to my early method of composition. Of late years I have suffered, not so much from inability of the eye, as dimness of the vision, and the warning comes that the time is not far distant when I must rely exclusively on the eyes of another for the prosecution of my studies. Perhaps it should be received as a warning that it is time to close them altogether.'

See, also, Ferdinand and Isabella, i., Pref., ix. 11; Mexico, i., Pref., xiv.; Peru, i., Pref., xiv.-xx.; Miscellanies, ed. 1855, 59-63; Philip II., i., Pref., xvi.

Thus, as we have seen, after many years of conscientions labour, Mr. Prescott had the gratification of presenting to his father and a few chosen literary adviserssenting to his lather and a lew enosen literary advisors— among whom were the eminent scholars George Ticknor and Jared Sparks—the results of his "long night of toil." This "audience, fit though few," he thought not of enlarging. "I have had the gratification of writing the work," he remarked to his father, "and shall place it on my library-shelf for those who come after me." But in Judge Prescott's case, fortunately for the world, the heart of the father and the head of the scholar were united, and to the proposed entombment of so much lore of wisdom and of beauty he would by no means consent. He appealed, however, not to the claims of literary ambition, but used an argument well suited to the grandson of the grim chieftain of Bunker Hill,—him for whom Colonel Willard made the memorable endorsement to General Gage, and whom the great Washington delighted to call "Prescott the brave." "The man who writes a book which he is afraid to publish," said Judge Prescott to his son, "is a coward." Now, it was never freeout to his son, "Is a coward." Now, is was hever known that a Prescott was "a coward;" and it was not for the first author of the family to obscure the family laurels.

Mr. Sparks's advice on this point shall be given in his own words:

"It is known that Mr. Prescott's eyesight was then so feeble that it was difficult for him to read; and, for the purpose of carefully preparing the composition of his work, he had it printed in large type, in quarto form, so that he could read it and correct it for the press, instead of revising it in manuscript. After it was finished, he sent me his two volumes, printed as I have described, and requested me to read them. I did so, of course, with very great pleasure and profit, and with no little surprises at the success of the writer, under his infirmity of sight, in accomplishing the work in so thorough and finished a manner. I returned the volumes, and soon after saw Mr. Prescott. He asked me, with a good deal of diffidence, what I thought of the book. I told him there could be but one opinion about it; that I had read the book with great delight, and thought he had written one of the nost successful works of its kind that had come before the public. 'But perhaps,' said he, 'you have read it under the bias of some degree of partiality and friendly feeling?' I told him I could not say as to that, but I had been exceedingly gratified with the perusal of the book. He then asked, 'bo you think it should be published?' He still expressed doubts, and enumerated objections. In the first place, the subject was not one likely to interest American readers: it related to Spain, and times long past. In the next place, he doubted very much whether the composition and execution of the work were of such a character as would make it attractive. His options was, in short, that it would not succeed. Of course I used very much whether the composition and execution of the work were of such a character as would make it attractive. His opinion was, in short, that it would not succeed. Of course I used what arguments I could, and told him that no impression of that sort could be entertained by any mind but his own. I left him, however, in that state of uncertainty. Mr. Gray has explained how he was induced to publish the work at last. The anecalote is characteristic of Mr. Prescott, and illustrates his modesty and entire freedom from self-estimation,"—Remarks of Jared Sparks, LLD.: Precedings of the Mass. Hint. Soc. in Respect to the Memory of W. H. Prescott, Feb. 1, 1869, 17-19. See, also, 10-13; and (Mr. Gray's reference to Judge Prescott's influence in causing the publication of Ferdinand and Isabella) 16-17.

The success of the History of the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella was great and immediate. It was published in Germany, France, and Spain, in the respective languages of those countries; appeared in an Italian version at Florence, 1847-48, 3 vols. 8vo; and early in 1858 a translation in Russ was announced in Russia. So bibliographical details connected with this work Mr. Prescott's subsequent publications are reserved for later pages of our sketch. The original materials for the History of Ferdinand and Isabella now repose, in the distory of recursion and accordance with the bequest of the author, in the Library of Harvard College. Of the compliments showered upon the successful historian, not the least value and and certainly amply earned, was his election to member-ellip by the Spanish Royal Academy of History, which holds its sessions in the city of Madrid. Thus certainly ngouraged by the most eminent representatives of letters enguraged of the most eminent representatives of seconds in many climes, Mr. Present again resumed his laborious studies, and in 1843 gave to the world the History of the Conquest of Mexico, and in 1847 his History of the Conquest of Dans. These works, the fruit of the most pains-taking investigations into manuscript authorities pro-cured from Spain, proved that the critics at home and abroad, if prompt and cordial, had not been too hasty in the designation of the elevated status which from first day of the publication of the History of the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella they had assigned to its au-At least one of the Mexican editions (there were two) of the Conquest of Mexico was garbled by the transtwo of the conquest of Mexico was garden by the challength of the country: the Madrid edition is not liable to this grave inculpation. In 1845 Mr. Prescott was induced to publish, under the title of Bio-graphical and Critical Miscellanics, a selection of twelve papers from his articles contributed to the North American Review between the years 1821 and 1843, and a Memoir of Charles Brockden Brown, originally published in Sparks's American Biography in 1834. The new editions of the Miscellanies are affectionately dedicated to Mr. Ticknor as a memorial of "studies pursued together in earlier days." This collection will be noticed more at length hereafter. In the summer of 1850 Mr. Prescott visited England, and in the autumn spent a

Prescott visited Eugland, and in the autumn spent a short time in Scotland and on the continent.

"Many years before," remarks Mr. Stirling, (Encyc. Brit.,) "he had passed through England as a young and comparatively unknown traveller; he now returned to it the American whom of all others, perhaps, intelligent Englishmen were most desirons to see and converse with. Euring his sejourn in London, Mr. Prescott was one of the most observed and popular personages in a society ever 'to famous wits native or hospitable.' In truth, he did not need his fame to aid his social success. His fine presence and countenance, his pleasing conversation, and his perfect manners would have ensured him a welcome even as a nameless stranger."

In 1855 Mr. Prescott published the first and second volumes, and in December, 1858, the third volume, of what would have proved, had it been completed, his greatest work,—The History of the Reign of Philip the Second, King of Spain. These volumes fully sustained to clevate would have been scarcely possible—the reputa-tion of the author as an accurate chronicler and elequent narrator. Vols. i. and ii. appeared in Russ in Russia, 1858. Between the publication of vols. i. and ii. and iii. of Philip II., i.e. in 1857, he had added to a new edition of Robertson's History of the Reign of Charles the Fifth, Boston, 3 vols. 8vo, a supplement, (pp. 327-519, vol. iii.,) entitled The Life of Charles the Fifth after his Abdica-Early in 1858 the apprehensions of Mr. Prescott's friends were aroused by a slight stroke of paralysis, from the effects of which he never entirely recovered, although he was soon able to resume his daily walks, and to spend two or three hours a day amidst his books and papers without any immediate inconvenience. On the 25th of January, 1859, he rose apparently well, and proposed to take a walk at his usual hour; but, as the morning was wet, he was persuaded by Mrs. Prescott to stay within. A few hours afterwards he left his secretary in the library, and stepped into an adjoining apartment, and, almost immediately after crossing the threshold, was seized with a second stroke of paralysis, of which he expired about two o'clock in the afternoon. The melancholy intelligence, as it was telegraphed from city to city over the wide land for which he had won "a name and a praise in the earth," produced a profound sensation of sorrow, which was testified by mournful gatherings and reverential tributes. Of the latter, one of the

He then proceeded to a meetion of various mutual friends that had passed away since our least meeting; especially of the Hun. Abbott Lawrence and Francis C. Gray, Esq., at whose dinner-table we had often met, and then of some arriving friends, especially of George Ticknor, Esq., who, he said, had shortened and brightened what, but for him, must have been many a sad and weary hour. . . He added, 'I suppose that Ticknor will never write another book; but he has been doing perhaps better for the community and posterity by devoting himself for several years to the interests of the Roston City Library, which may be taken in good part as his work; and a more valuable contribution to the good of the people has seldom been made. It is a rare thing for such an institution to get a man so rarely qualified by taste, knowledge, and accomplishment, to look after its interests with such energy and patience.' . . I said, 'Mr. Prescott, are you not coming to New York! We should all be very glad to see you there.' 'No,' he replied; 'I suppose that the days of my long journeys are over. I must content myself, like licrace, with my three houses. You know I go at the commencement of summer to my cuttage by the sea-side at Lynn Beach; and at autumn to my patrimonial across at Pepperell, which have been in our family for two hundred years, to sit under the old trees I sat under when a boy; and then with winter come down to hibernate in this house. This is the only travelling, I suppose, that I shall do until I go to my long home. . . He then speke in glowing and grateful terms, as I alluded to the interest taken in his health throughout the country, to the kindness which he had invariably experienced at the hands of his countrymen: 'I can never, he said, be sufficiently grateful for the tokens of estem, regard, and affection which I have had from them through all the years of my literary career. True, it makes me feel like an old man

This is a true saying, and can be confirmed by "a cloud of witnesses" whose testimonials lie around us; but more of this anon.

Mr. Prescott left a widow, two sons, and a daughter. Having thus given a rapid summary of Mr. Proscott's literary career, we proceed to consider his publications more in detail, and shall conclude our sketch with some notices of his general characteristics as an author, and of his virtues as a man.

1. HISTORY OF THE REIGN OF FERDINAND AND TRABELLA THE CATHOLIC, Boston, American Stationers' Company, (Doc. 25, 1837, dated) 1838, 3 vols. 8vo; last ed., Phila, J. B. Lippincott & Co., 1868, 3 vols. 8vo, Repub. in England, France, Italy, and Germany, Lon., 1838, 3 vols. 8vo. Pub. by R. Bentley, who continued to republish Prescott's works in London as they appeared, until the latter part of 1858, when he disposed of his interest to the present sole publishers, Routledge, Warne, and Rout-ledge, the senior of which firm had also previously publenge, the senior of which firm had also previously published editions of Prescott's works. 12th London ed. of Ferdinand and Isabella, 1859, viz.: I., Lib. ed., 2 vols., demy 8vo, steel plates, 21s.; II., Cab. ed., 3 vols. p. 8vo, steel plates, 12s.; II., 1 vol. ed., er. 8vo, 5s.; IV., Cheap ed., 2 vols. fp. 8vo, bds. 4s., el. 5s.; adv. to 5s. 1861. Copies printed in the United States and London to Jan. I, 1860, 17,751. Before taking up, or after finishing, this work, the author should turn to Mr. Prescott's remarks on the Saracen dominion in Snain. the sononest marks on the Saracen dominion in Spain, the conquest of Granada, and the policy of Ferdinand and Isabella, in his review of Irving's Conquest of Granada, 1829, 2 vols. 12mo, published in the North American Review for October, 1829, 293-314. It is not to be denied that the portion of history selected by Mr. Prescott for illustration in these volumes had been neglected by the scholars of Germany, France, and England, and only superficially touched by Italian writers: it is equally cortain that at an earlier date no faithful narration of the events of this reign could have been given to the world. In the days of Robertson, "the highways" of Spanish history may be truly said to have been "unoccupied, and the travellers"—the few adventurous travellers—"walked through by-ways,"—the "by-ways" of crumbling librae, which is night to be the said of chives, guarded by the vigilant care of the Holy Office, —a vigilance only to be southed by policy, seduced by

guile, or soporated by gold. But Mr. Present had the alvantage of the tragic annals of Llorente, the political disquisitions of Mariana, Sempere, and Capmany, the literal version of the Spanish-Arab Chronicies by Condé, the Coleccion de los Viages of Navarrete, (see Envise, Washington, p. 941.) the invaluable illustrations of Isabella's reign by Mr. Secretary Clemencia, mahy rare works and curious manuscripts purchased by his friend George Tiekuor, in Spain, for his own library, and unpublished documents of priceless value, collected from all available quarters, under the directions of the historian, by the realous agency of Alexander H. Everett, Arthur Middleton, and the learned hiblicpole, Mr. O. Rich. So copious were the materials; but they were materials only,—useless save to the plastic hand of genius,—and with most men-with most zealous and dexterous scholars, even-they would either have remained unused, or would, from want of skill in the workmanship, have "perished with the using." Courage less resolute would not have projected, industry less patient would have hardly perrered in, tasto less exquisite could never have so beautifully accomplished, the erection of this great monu-ment. With what admiration it was hatled by foreign scholars on the continent of Europe, we have already seen. What was the verdict of the most eminent of Engtish and American critical authorities? The adduction of some of these we shall preface by a brief citation from the review of the work in the Edinburgh Review, from the accomplished English pen of Don Pascual de Gayangos, (the learned translator of the Mahommedan Dynasties in Spain,) than whom there is no higher authority. (See Ferd, and Is., 3d Lon. ed., 1841, Prof.; Philip II., i., Prof., v.-vdi., iii. 13, n.; Eng. Cyc., Biog., iv., 1856, 43; Lon. Athen., 1840, 103, 1844, 55.)

It was Mr. Present's fate—it proved to be also his felicity—to be tried before learned judges and exacting The editor of the London Quarterly placed upon the Beach that terror to all pretended enthusiasts in An-dalusian scenery and Catalan customs, the late author and the famous Hand-Book, (see p. 61i, supra,) who is, or who ought to be, known by the subriquet of "Spanish Ford." Mr. Ford deals out praise and censure with great apparent impartiality: we give some specimens of great apparent impartiality: we give some specimens of each:

"Many of his notes... are extremely unsatisfactory. Of the accuracy of his quotations and references we cannot speak too highly; they stamp a guarantee on his narrative; they enable us to give a reason for our faith; they furnish means of questioning and correcting the author himself; they enable readers to follow up any particular subject suited to their own ideoxynthms that of the work from which he draws. This research and hiddly appear to be the marked features of Mr. Prescott's talent, which is synthetical, not analytical. He can collect facts, arrange details, and present a faithful and agreeable picture of the shift such make of history. He is less successful in his attempts to unravel the web, to separate causes from effects, to distruguish motives from pretexts,—in a word, to cach a fixed, definite insight into the spirit of the fifteenth century. His siyls a too often sequipodalian and ornate; the stilty wordy, false tests of Dr. Chansing, without his depth of thought; the sugar and sack of Washington Irving, without the hallponny-worth of bread,—without his grace and polish of pure, grammatical, earsful Anglicium. Another serious objection which we design to go out to Mr. Prescott is a twistony to since at monarciales, courts, chivairy, and all those notice institutions, the heat of which ... Porass the present weakness of, and will evectually decide the problems of, democracy now pending in the United States. ... Mr. Prescott is a trying in two of the most belilians pertiens of his thems, the conquest of Granada, and the history of Columbus, [see Invise, Washington, p. Philip and we fully enter into the natural feeling; persons qui ante new nostra discrint. But if he will correct cortain blemishes of style, which are unworthy of his taients, amiable character, and literary perseverance, he has no cause to fear a competition with Mr. Irving. The world is wide enough for all. There is nothing new under the sun. 'Lo beau est mon bion, at je ler persond on je le retrouve.' The novelty consists in the famion, the 'callida junctura' of the workman: 'A l'œuvre on consuit l'artisan.' 'A' Rr. Prescott, though heartily sympathising with the hero, [Onlumbus,] has throughout endeavoured to maintain the impartial spirit of a judge. . . We must also repeat our opinion that, with all its errors and omissions of manner and matter, Mr. Prescott's is by much the first historical work which British America has as yet produced, and one that need hardly fear a comparison with any that has issued from the European press succ this century began."—June, 1839, 7, 8, 9, 10, 41, 42, 58.

We know not to whom (unless to Mr. Mitford) to ascribe the verdict just cited; but the value of that which follows will not be questioned by scholars:

follows will not be questioned by scholars:

"The 'History of Ferdinand and Isabella' was published at the close of 1837 or the beginning of 1838; and on my arrival in kurope in the summer of 1840 I found it extensively known and duly appreciated. . Calling one day on the venerable Mr. Thomas Grenville, whom I found in his library, (the second in size and value of the private libraries of England), reading Xenophou's 'Anabasis' in the original, I made some passing remark on the beauty of that work. 'Here,' said he, holding up a volume of 'Ferdinand and Isabella,' is one far superior.' With the exception of the Nestor of our literature, (Mr. Irving,) no American writer appeared to me so wf6ely known or so highly esteemed in England as Mr. Prescott; and when he visited that country, a few years later, the honours paid to him by all the cultivated classes of society, from the throne downward, were such as are seldom offered to the most distinguished visitant."

To the same effect is the testimony of a distinguished American statesman who visited England about eighteen months after the publication of Mr. Prescott's first work:

Such was the gratifying reception of Mr. Prescott's first literary offspring: has a familiar acquaintance of twenty years, have the rival claims of his children of maturer days, lowered this estimate?

The last commentator, and certainly one of the most competent, on Mr. Prescott's productions is the learned author of the Annals of the Artists of Spain, The Cloister-Life of the Emperor Charles the Fifth, and Velasques and his Works,-Mr. Stirling, M.P. for Perthshire. his interesting biographical sketch of Mr. Prescott, contributed to the Encyclopædia Britannica, 8th ed., 1859,

The condition and relations of the crown, the nobles, the clerky, the cities, and the commons, are painted with a masterly hand, and are presented in a picture at once clear, concise, and complete. The will, alle Ferdinand and the good Isabella, the model of womanly heroism, are portrayed with consummate skill and delicacy; and neither Robertson nor Irrung has excelled in easy pace the narratives of the slege of Malaga and the crowning conquest of Granda."—508.

"By the author's own countrymen it was received with a hearty welcome, and in England it met with almost unqualified praise from the literary organs of all parties; while in the country whose favourite monarchs it celebrates it was greeted with enthusiasm, and the author was elected a member of the Royal Academy of Madrid. Nor has its popularity been evanescent.

Its popularity was well metited. For the first time, the period of history when Spain rose to a leading position among the nations of Europe was fully, clearly, and vividly placed before the English reader from original and official sources; and the narrative was conducted, and events and characters was estimated, with a fairness and conscientionsoes which showed itself in every page, and led the reader to rest implicitly on the good faith of the historian."—English Cyclopadia, Hiog., iv., 1857, 964. 1857, 961.

"Ferdinand and Isabella,—in my opinion his best work,"— FRANCIS LERBER, LL.D.: Letter to the author of this Dictionary, Oct. 16, 1856.

So Humboldt, it is thought, gave the preference to Ferdinand and Isabella over the author's other works,— remarking that it was "an enduring history, and could never be superseded." On the other hand, the critic of never be superseded." On the other hand, the critic of the Edinburgh Review, in his notice (April, 1845) of the History of the Conquest of Mexico,—see our quotations respecting this work, infra,—predicts greater popularity for the latter. He was not mistaken. According to the title-pages, it appears that there were published in the United States in nineteen years, (1838-56,) of Ferdinand and Isabella, eleven editions, in thirteen years, (1843-55,) of The Conquest of Mexico, twenty-three editions. In London there appear to have been published in twenty-two years, (1838-59,) of Ferdinand and Isabella, twelve additions: in saventeen years, (1843-59,) of The Conquest editions; in seventeen years, (1843-59,) of The Conquest of Mexico, ten editions.

The first American review of Ferdinand and Isabella—a paper alive with the great personages of the times and their biographers—appeared in the North American Quarterly for January, 1838. From this valuable historical disquisition, from the pen of W. H. Gardiner, (see IRVING, WASHINGTON, p. 942, 1846), we quote the summing up of the learned judge: "Such are the weightiest of the trifling poccadilioes in a large work, which we can point out for the author's correcting, if he shall be pleased to adopt our judgment, in some future edition. "We cannot but timidly flatter ourselves that, one day or another, our American aspirants for literary honoure will get more into the way of spending some time in sowing and reaping their laurels, preparatory to tuning their voices for the Harvest Home. A very few examples, at all like the recent one of Mr. Prescott's brilliant success, cannot fail of producing a decided effect of this kind; and whoever, by showing what a mind of high endowments owes to itself, and what it may achieve if it have but fair play, disposes our young scholars to be content to wait for applause III they have taken time to deserve it, has done a service to his country worthy of all grateful commensoration."—J. G. PALFREE: Hillhouse's Peems and Discourses: N. Amer. Rev., Jan. 1840, 282.

"The 'History of Fertinand and Isabella' is a work that united the fracination of romantic fiction with the grave interest of authentic events. Its author makes no pretension to analytical power, except in the arrangement of his materials; he is content to describe, and his islents are more artistic than philosophical; neither is any established theory or principle obvious; his ambition is apparently limited to skilful narration. Indeficial by the subjects have yielded so much of pictureogue material mad romantic interest as to atone for the lack of any more original or brilliant qualities in the author."—II. T. TUCKERMAN. (pp. 187-235) in the London Quarterly, vol. Ixxiii., Doc. 1843, by Dean H. H. Milman. We can quote but a few lines:

"Mr. Prescott possesses high qualifications, and some peculiar advantages, for the execution of such a work. . . . In his disquisitions on the political state and the civilization of the Axtee Ringdoms, he is full and copious, without being profix and wearlsome; the narrative is flowing and spirited, sometimes very pictureague; his style has dropped the few Americanisms which still jarred on our fastedious car in his former work, and is, in general, pure and sound English. Above all, his judgments are unaffectedly candid and impartial. . . We conclude with expressing our satisfaction that Mr. Prescott has given us an opportunity at this time of showing our deep sympathy, the sympathy of kindred and of blood, with Americans who, like hinself, do honour to our common interature. Mr. Prescott may take his place among the really good English writers of history in modern times, and will be received, we are persended, into that small community with every feeling of friendly and fratorial respect."—188, 255. This review was copied into the Boston Living Age, i. 10-32.

"Mr. Prescott appears to us to possess almost every qualification for his task. He has a pure, simple, and eloquent style—it keenrelish for the picturesque—a quick and discerning judgment of character—and a calm, generous, and enlightened spirit of philanthropy. There is no exaggeration in assorting that his "Conquest of Mexico" combines—some allowance, where that is necessary, boding made for the inferior extent and importance of its subject—most of the valuable qualities which distinguish the most popular historical writers in our language of the present day, it unites the chivairous but truthful enthusisms of Colonel Napler, and the vivacity of the accomplished author of the Biego of Granada, with the patient and ample re-carch of Mr. Tyter. . . It would be easy to fill our pages with sparking quotations, with sketches of secury worthy

The perusal of this paper gratified Mr. Prescott.

"We are embarrassed by the coploances of the subject, and the exaberant richness of the successive pictures, and the variety of subjects it comprehends. . Even the first volume as a comprehends in its views as to afford at once a description of the natural features, the climate and productions of the country, and of the various and renote migrations of the people; theory of their government, laws, and revenue; of their political state, their military institutions, and their religious belief and worship; of the arts of life and the degree to which they had attained; and of the domestic manners and habits; as well as of the discovery of the country by its future conqueror.

Mr. Peracent has also given us a valuable essay on that difficult had attained; and of the domestic manners and habits; as well as of the discovery of the country by its future conqueror.

Mr. Prescott has also given us a valuable essay on that difficult and controverted subject, the origin of Mexican civilization, as connected with the magnificent ruins and architectural antiquisting of Central America, discovered by Mr. Stephena, and with the remains of Paienque and Uxmul described by Dupaix and Waldack."—Lon. "The History of the Conquest of Mexico, by Mr. Prescott, a work still fresh in the recollection of our readers, served greatly to increase that reputation as an historian which he had acquired by his Ferdinand and Isabella. The subject was happily characted by him."—Lon. Gent. Mag., July, 1947, 3–5: Prescott's History of the Conquest of Pers.

"We radice to see Mr. Prescott again in the field... The more closely we examine Mr. Prescott's work, the more do we find cause to commend his diligent recent, as well as his care and condour in comparing together his numerous and effections contined the historians; and paragraphs conflicting authorities. His vivacity of manner, and discursive observations controved through notes as well as text, furnish soundless prouds of his matchless industry. In point of style, too, he ranks with the ablest English historians; and paragraphs or addition are combined with Robertson's majestic cadence and Gibbon's brillancy."—Lon. Miss Ridgeworth has asserted that this is the best historical work published during the present century; she might have added, the best work ever published on the subject."—Rich's Bibl. Asser. New, (1, 1384, 376.

"It's a noble work; judiciously planned and admirably executed; rich with the spoils of learning easily and gracefully worn; imbued everywhere with a conscientious love of the truth, and controlled by that unerying good sense without which genius leads astray with its false lights, and learning encumbers with its heavy panoply. It will win the literary rolupturary to its pages by the attractiveness of its at boot and the flowing ease of its style; and the historical student will do honour to the extent and variety of the research which it displays, and to the thoroughness with which its investigations have been conducted. We can confidently predict for it an extensive and permanent popularity. It will take its place among those enduring productions of the human mind which age cannot stale and custom cannot wither."—George S. Hilland: N. Amer. "The result of all his labours, of research, thought, and composition, was a history possessing the unity, variety, and interest of a magnificent poem. It deals with a series of facts, and exhibits a gallery of characters, which to have invented would place its creator by the side of Homer; and which to realize and represent in the mode Mr. Prescott has done, required a rare degree of historical imagination."—R. Another work also claims our notice. Within the last few months, and since Mr. Prescott's death, has been published A New History of the Conquest of Mexico, by Robert Anderson Wilson, Counsellor-at-Law, Author of Mexico and its Religion, &c., Phila., 1859, 8vo, pp. 539.

"We venture to say," remarks the (New York) Knickerbocker, "that had this book been published thirty years ago, Mr. Prescott would never have written of the Mexican Conquest as he did; and wheever writes or reads of it hereafter must take the facts which Mr. Wilson proves into his secount."

"The apparent consequences are," says the Methodist Quarterly Review, "that some splendid fictions must disappear from the story of our continent, and some of the most valued volumes—not only of Robertson, but of Prescott—must leave the department of history, and take their position in the domains of romance,"

North American Review, April, 1859, 576, "unless we adopt Sydney Smith's doctrine and regard on selves as specially qualified to review it by not having read it. But we have read enough to see that it is a work of no ordinary ability, research, holdness, and vigour. Mr. Wison has collected in Mexico all the materials there accessible for his use, and especially has examined the alleged monuments of Azice civilization, which dwindle on a near approach. He pronounces Bernal Diaz a myth, and, of course, his so-called personal mariative a collection of myths.
With all the fervour of an iconoclast, he deals destruction among historical traditions till now undoubted. We are not yet prepared to believe that his reading of this portion of American history will take its place as genuine; but we reserve our opiaion till we have a right to form it."

G. Squier, the author of Travels in Central America and other learned antiquation of the control of the c rian works, unite in condemning Mr. Wilson's volume as unworthy of the least degree of consideration. "This is certainly pretty well for 'a myth." But to be serious,
An author like Mr. Wilson, who makes the boldest assertions, and then is obliged to run for luck in order to find evidence that he may hope will support them,—who has so little fairness or judgment as is shown by his treatment of Dr. Robertson, and olittle knowledge or spirit of luquiry as he has shown in the case of Bernal Diaz,—can really have no claim to the character of an historian. Still loss has he a right to speak in any tone

"The work of Mr. Wilson in no degree justifies its title, still less its pretensions. It does not add a single new fact to our stock of knowledge on the subject to which it relates; and it is throughout characterised by dogmatism, presumption, and ignorance, rendered doubly offensive by a crude, inflated, and consisted style. . . Mr. Wilson has not only proved himself in severy essential respect incompetent for the undertaking, but has brought discredit, if not contempt, on American scholarship, so far as he may be supposed to be an exponent of its character."

Another unfavourable review of Wilson's Conquest of Mexico, nearly four columns in length, by Mr. J. W. Dwinelle, of Rochester, New York, was published in the New York Tribune of April 12, 1859. We quote the con-

seluding lines:

"We will not follow Mr. Wilson to the 'Lake of Mexico,' where his facts refute his argument. We have not examined his personal statements: after the ill fortune we have had with his elitations and engravings, that task would be beyond our capa-

But we at a compelled to say that, baving gone over much of the ground to which the researches of Mr. Prescett pointed the way, we have found his statements in every instance horne out by his citations; we have never found him suppressing, never mutilating, a material fact; and never in those authors who are not cited by him have we found an important fact which is not included in the completeness of his generalizations. Such was the conscientious integrity of a historian who considered the suppression of truth the same as a wiful falsehood; such his exhaustive research, which permitted no important fact to even him; such his modesty, which refused to encumber his pages with a merely cumulative crudition."

"Mr. Prescott's style and manner of composition are adapted with singular felicity to this half-poetic instory. His strong imaginative faculty, heightened by the peculiarity of his situation. (of which more presently.) delights in the rich and the marvellous, both in nature and in human action; he has acquired a skill of arrangement and grouping of characters and events which attest long and patient study of the highest models; while the calmer moral and Christian tone of his judgments by no means deadens his sympathies with the flercor sed more barbarous herousm of ancient days. "In the Conquest of Mexico and the Conquest of Peru," remarks Mr. Stirling, (Encyc. Brit., at supra.) "and especially in the chapters on the civilization of the Axtecs and the Locas, Mr. Prescott displays great segacity in assorting the scattered fragments of social edifices, which were dectroyed before they could be intelligently delineated, and in recalling to their living forms the dry bones of the extinct races which inhabited them. Ho also appears to have shaken off the diffidence of a stranger in the historical field. His style betckens more self-confidence, and is bolder and more animated. His descriptions of scenery, in which he is always happy and never redundant, are more full and vivid, and are elaborated with the greater care which was required by the strangeness of unfamiliar lands. Mexico spreads her matchless valley, her lake, and her imperial city before our eyes; we wander through the royal gardens, beneath the giant cedars, of Tescuccy; the golden halls of the Inca and the blazing temples of the sun unfaild themselves before us; we follow the silver-shod cavalry of Pizarro through the flowery dales of the Cordilloras; or we ascend through the packure of the Andes. In the preparation of these volumes Mr. Prescott is and to have employed six years. A letter written by him from Brussels in the summer of 1850 (see Philip II., i. 342, m.) will show the enthusiasm with which he entered into the spirit of the age of Charles the Fifth, send will probably remind the reader of the "unsings" of the historian of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire "amidst the ruins of the Capitol, while the barefooted friars were singing vespers in the Temple of Juniter." piter.

Vols. i. and il. bring down the stary to the execution of Counts Eigmont and Hours, in 1568, and to the imprisonment and death of Don Carlos. In the collection of materials for this history Mr. Prescott spared neither time, cost, personal labour, nor the services of willing friends. Public and private collections were freely opened to his use, and the long-closed doors of the ancient Archives of Simaneas, (respecting which, see Lon. Athenseum, 1860, ii. 593, 910; 1861, i. 51; 1862, ii. 653, and Lon. Gent. Mag., 1857, ii. 152,) and of other secret repositories, flew open at the name of the magician whose potent gonius had reanimated the glories of the Old World and depicted with a vivid penoil the sorrows and desolation of the New. Notices of the valuable mass of unpublished materials thus collected will be found in the Preface to Philip II., and in Mr. Edward Everett's Remarks before the Massachusetts Historical Society,-Proceedings, &c., Feb. 1 1859, 47-49.

Some time before the publication of the first and second volumes of Philip the Second, Mr. Ticknor, after a gorgoous exhibition of the "goodly stones" and brilliant gems of which the great architect was to construct his noble edifice, remarks,

"These grand materials, thus grouped together, constitute a subject for history which the great masters of ancient or of modern times might well envy to Mr. Prescott. That it will—seem more than any thing he has yet done—insure him a place by their side, we do not doubt."—Duyckincks' Cyc. of Amer. Lit., 1555, ii. 237.

The prospect would indeed have appalled one less confident in his own resources, less conscious of greater strength than had yet been developed by past exertions. Under Mr. Prescott's infirmity, a task requiring such minute scrutiny and unwearied application ("day-labour, light denied") was-or would have been to other menmost discouraging. But Mr. Ticknor-for he knew the builder as well as the difficulties of his enterprise-was fully justified in his prediction: there were no lamontations over the diminished glories of a later temple. The muse of Dryden, eloquent in deploring the proofs of intellectual decadence, would have sought in vain for inspiration in a comparison of the earlier and the last fruits of the genius of the historian.

The first instalment of Philip the Second was received with enthusiasm in all countries:

"The great historian of the New World," writes Humboldt to a German correspondent, "who has scurcely a rival in the Old one, the excellent Prescott, has rejoiced us with a new book."

From M. Guizot's review of the volumes, in the Edinburgh Review for January, 1857, we have already quoted, (MOTLEY, JOHN LOTHROP, p. 1379,) and recommend the reader to peruse the whole paper. A few lines must be extracted in this place, as an amusing instance of differences of opinion between great critics, or—if M. Guizot be correct in his analysis — of a great change in the literary characteristics of the historian. One of the most prominent features of Mr. Prescott's style, in the opinion of many readers, is the accuracy, brilliancy, and general felicity of his descriptions. For more than any thing else, perhaps, he has been blanced for occasional want of simplicity in language. But hear M. Guizot on these points:

"To this merit of a well-arranged history Mr. Prescott adds that of an easy, unaffected, though somewhat frigid, power of narration. He belongs to the historical school of Robertson, judicious rather than profound in its general views, and more romarkable for simplicity than for descriptive power. The pictures Mr. Prescott has given us are never wanting in truth, but they are sometimes wanting in life. History only becomes dramatic on two conditions: it must have either the passion of the politician or the imagination of the poet. Mr. Prescott has neither the one nor the other; he is a caim and enlightened philosopher, an accomplished man of letters; he is well read in the history of Philip II., and he relates it with fidelity; but he has studied it after the lapse of three contructs in all the agranity of his own reflections and the tranquillity of a New England study; faithfully, therefore, as these events and these personages are described by him, he leaves them where he finds them,—in their tombs."

"In addition to its substantial value as a contribution to the political, religions, and social annuls of Europe, it derives some of its most admirable qualities from the peculiar genius of its author. In a warmly-coloured style—clear, flexible, and full of variety—Mr. Prescott narrates the incidents of Philip's reign. His story moves swiftly, but is nowhere incomplete. The personages are well grouped; the order of circumstances and the order of time are well reconcled; the events are neither confused nor isolated. The book is at once pictorial and sober, critical and dramatic. . . The historian has aurmounted with singular art the obvious difficulties of his subject. . . Tracing the origin and cause of these political, religious, and military events, Mr. Prescott fills his canvas with accessary details,—with delicately tinted pictures of social life,—with grand architectural perspectives,—with pageants described in language which reflects the gorgeous varieties of Burgundian pompand splendour. . . When complete, it will rank juxtly with Mr. Prescott's former works, which have taken permanent place in all historical libracies."—Lon. Athensum, Nov. 3, 1855, 1263-1266. Copied into the Boston Liv. "Mr. Prescott was again to achieve great and unquestionable success. Of the importance of the addition which this work has made to English historical literature there is but one option. The excellences of the author's previous works are all here—the picturesque narrative, the lucid style, the generous yet judicial spirit, the thorough digestion and scrupulous sifting of the materials,—often not only contradictory in themselves, but embarrassing in their richness,—and, above and pervading all, the thorough integrity of purpose, the earnest and untring parsuit and ever-present love of truth, which, and his many asmirable qualities, is that which is perhaps his prime characteristic as a historian."—English Cyclopasia, Biog., iv., 1867, 964.

"The query you put to me as to the time which will be occupied by me in completing the history of Philip II., I believe Edipus himself could not answer. The work may extend to six volumes. I had a contract with my London publisher, limiting me to that number, for which I was to receive from him £1000 a volume,—when the decision in the House of Lords that foreigners are not entitled to copyright, left me at liberty to write as many volumes and with as little profit as I please. Here I have made no contract as to the number, which I think, however, should not exceed five."

See, also, R. C. Weld's Vacation Tour, 1855, 8vo; Stirling's Memoir of Prescott, in Encyc. Brit., 8th ed., xviii. 505. We observe that Mr. Stirling remarks that Mr. Prescott's income from his writings "has been estimated at from £4000 to £5000 a year." The aggregate sale of his four histories and the volume of Miscellanies to Jan. 1, 1860, has been 195,971 volumes. The third volume of Philip II. (embracing the period 1560 to 1574) is mainly occupied by the revolt of the Moors, the hattle of Lepanto, and the building of the Escurial. Lord Macaulay, in a letter to a Boston correspondent, commended this volume in the highest terms, and expressed the opinion that, with the exception of a few chapters of some of the author's previous works, his last production

"Prescott's last volume was finished after he was sixty; and it is a perfect model of skill in narration. Every statement is the result of most elaborate research; and yet, as he passes from court to country, from valley to mountain-ranges, from Spain to the Levant, among Moors, and Turks, and Christians, and corsairs from Barbary, his movements are as easy and graceful as those of the humning-bird as it dives after honey among the flowers of summer, and his pictures of battles are as vivid as though the sun had taken them in its brightest colours at the very moment they were raging."—thougs Baxesor: Address before the N. The reign of Charles V. s. the intermediate link between those of Ferdinand and Isabella and Philip II., and completes an unbroken period of 150 years of the Spanish annals. To the life of the emperor subsequently to his abdication, some six or seven pages only are devoted by Dr. Robertson; and these contain so many errors that they had been better unwritten. Robertson was unable to obtain the information then locked up in the archives of Simaneas. Of this information, and of the labours of his producessors, Mr. Stirling, M. Pichot, M. Cachard, and M. Mignet, Mr. Prescott has freely availed himself, as stated in his profuces to the Life of Charles the Fifth, and his own supplement.

But he modestly persisted in thinking that the reign of Charles V. was exhausted by Robertson. The supplementary chapter with which he has enriched the edition of Rebertson's work published under hissupervision a few years since, is sufficient proof that it would have been in his power to construct an original history of the reign of Charles V. which would have fully equalled in interest any that has been produced by him."—Proceedings of the Mass. For The Club-Room, of which four numbers only speared, (Feb. to July, 1820,) of which he was the editor, he wrote three articles; and he published many pieces in local papers. He also contributed, in 1849, to the Collections of the Massachusetts Historical Society, 3d Series, vol. x., 1849, 204-224, a Memoir of John Pickering, LL.D., (supra;) and in 1856, to the National Portrait-Gallery, a biographical aketch of Abbott Lawrence—this was also privately printed, separately, 1856, 4to.

We have already referred to a notice in the Revista Contemporanea of Turin, of the articles on Italian poetry (X. and XI., supra) in the volume of Mr. Prescott's Miscellanies. The whole volume is reviewed at some length (the article is principally composed of quotations from Prescott and Petrarch) in the Gentleman's Magazine for March, 1846, 227-245. After an animated culogy on the histories of Ferdinand and Isabella, and the Conquest of Mexico, in which, as we have seen on a previous page, Mr. Prescott is judged to have "much exceeded Robert-

mr. Prescott is judged to have "much exceeded Robertson," the critic proceeds to consider the Miscellanies:

"The volume," he says, "is not distinguished for much originality of observation or refinement of critical ingenuity, and still less for any acquaintance with literature beyond what is generally obtained by persons of studious habits and cultivated minds; but Mr. Prescott always shows a sufficient acquaintance with his subject; he commands respect by the temperance of his judgments, and he pleases by the beauty of his language and the elegance of his style."

his judgments, and he pleases by the beauty of his language and the elegance of his style."

"Great learning or produndity of criticism there is not," remarks the London Literary Gazette; "but all who love a light and pleasant style of observation thrown over topics of universal interest will find enough here to afford them acceptable information and rational pastine."—Angus 23, 1845, 578.

"All good," is the verdict of the London Athenseum, "and some noticed at the time, with commendation, in the Athenseum."—Aug. 23, 1845, 835.

"As a critic and essayist," remarks Mr. Stirling, "Mr. Prescott would have attained great eminence had he pursued that path of letters. His essays on Cervantes, Molière, Scott, and Italian narrative poetry, are written with much taste, and with a just appreciation of their subjects. His reviews are none of them examples of the slashing style of criticism. When he turned aside from his own chosen course, it was for the purpose of throwing some fresh light upon the old master-plees, or of hidding an unknown follow-labourer welcome to the temple of Fame. If a blockhead was to be lashed, or a knave exposed, he left them to critics who loved to perform such operations. It was very characteristic of his gentle and genial nature that he prefaced his volume of cessays, which most readers will be disposed to regard as eminently calm and candid in tone, with the wish 'that some of his critical judgments had been expressed in a more qualified and temperate manner."—Energe. Brit., ut supra, 507.

It is almost needless to remark that Mr. Prescott's merits as a historian were cordially recognized by literary societies at home and abroad. The degree of Doctor of Laws was conferred by Columbia College, New York, in 1840; by the College of South Carolina in 1841; by Harvard University in 1843; and by the University of Ore of the College of South Carolina in 1850. of Oxford in 1850. Shortly after the publication of his History of the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, as we have seen, he was elected a Corresponding Member of the Royal Academy of History at Madrid; the same bonour was awarded by the French Institute, (Class of Moral and Political Philosophy, as successor to Navar-rete,) in 1845; by the Royal Society of Literature, (through Henry Hallam;) and by the Society of Antiquarios, (through Lord Mahon;) and in 1852 (see Macaular, Rr. Hon. Thomas Bariston, M.P., Baron Macaular, p. 1161, ante) by the Royal Irish Academy.
We have quoted Mr. Stirling's and Mr. Everett's accounts of the evidences of consideration accorded to Mr.

Prescott in England during his last visit to Europe, in 1850.

"I was there before him," remarks Mr. Curtis; "and when his purpose to make this visit was known, it is no exaggeration to say that in all ranks and all forms of society in which intelligent men and women were found, there was crident a sensation of anticipated pleasure, a delightful expectation of curtosity and interest, which no countryman of his could witness without pride. What followed after his arrival, you all know. Public and private honours, the homage of the head and the homage of the heart, were showered upon him by all ranks."—Froceedings Mass. Miss. Soc., &c., Pob. 1, 1859, xl.
"Wherever the English language is spoken," writes the histories of the Dutch. Republic.—"over the whole earth—his name is perfectly familiar. We sil of us know what his place was in Amelica. But I can also say that in eight years [1851–1850] passed should I never met a single educated person, of whatever nation, that was not well acquainted with his fame, and hardly one who had not read his works. No living American name is so widely spread over the whole world."—I Lothrop Stolley to Williams Amery, Rome, 20th February, 1859.

"No sooner had I touched my foot upon the English shores," [in May, 1868,] remarks Mr. Felton, "than questions with regard to his condition were addressed to me by numerous English friends; and I happened to meet some of these who had known him bost and most affectionately in this country and in Europe. It was a satisfaction to me that I had it in my power to give them the latest news on a subject which seemed to interest the heart of the whole literary world."—Proceedings Mass Mist. Soc., &c., 250, 1, 1869, 28.

The present writer—the author of this Dictionary—can add something to this testimony: Mr. Ingersoll, the American ambassador to the Court of St. James in 1852

American ambassador to the Court of St. James in 1852

"You are aware of the estimate in which some of our American historians, poets, and writers of fictitious works are held in England. Prescott and Longfellow are at least as much admired abroad as at home. This sentiment is quite strong at the present time, and there is every disposition to strengthen and preserve it."

Lord Macaulay remarks to us, in a letter received since

Mr. Prescott's death,

Mr. Prescott's death,

"I had as great a regard for Mr. Prescott as for any man of whom I knew so little, and I think very highly of his works."

Sir Archibald Alison writes us, (Glasgow, June 4, 1859,)

"Mr. Prescott was by far the first historian of America, and he may justly be assigned a place beside the very greatest of modern Europe. To the indispensable requisites of such an author—industry, candour, and impartiality—he united crasmental qualities of the highest grade: a mind stored with various and elegant learning, a pootical temperament, and great, firmly aligned to the highest grade: a mind stored with various and elegant learning, a pootical temperament, and great, firmly alitted appeared not less strongly in his last production, the flistory of the Reign of Philip the Second, than in the earlier works—the History of the Reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, the History of The Conquest of Mexico, and the History of the Cap the Conquest of Poru, which won for him his world-wide fame. The death of such a man, in the prime of life, and in the meridian of his powers, is a liss not to his country since, but to the whole human race, to whom his beautiful writings will always prove a source of instruction and enjoyment."

PRESCOTT'S CHARACTERISTICS AS AN AUTHOR.

"At the moment of terminating this analysis of an episode of the great work [Philly II., see supra] of Mr. Procecut, the intelligence reaches me of his sudden death at Boston, at an age when so many and useful labours might still have been hoped for from him. I am ignorant whether he has been able to terminate the work for which he had so conscientionally prepared himself. Even historians, indeed, have evinced such praiseworthy secupationsness in the composition of their writings. Far from sharting with a system laid down a priori, and making the facts be had to deal with bend to it. Mr. Prescott thought that the first duty of a historian was to assemble all its existing documents, classifying and parifying them by a severe criticism, and to employ all his efforts for the discovery of truth. Like Augustin Thierry, he surmounted, by the force of his will, obstacles which seemed almost invancible and to exclude him from the researches of the historian. . . . Of a just and upright spirit, he isd a horror of paradox. He never allowed himself to be drawn away by it, and often condemned himself to be drawn away by it, and often condemned himself to be drawn away by it, and often condemned himself to be drawn as his good faith. If he may be reproached with often hesitaling, even after a long investigation, to pronounce a definitive judgment, we must at least acknowledge that he omitted nothing to prepare the way for it, and that the author, too timid perhaps to decide, always leaves his reader sufficiently instructed need no other guide."—M. Prosent Meximals: Revue des Deux Mandes, tono xx.. 1869, 600.

"As a writer, Mr. Prescott occupies a distinguished place in the first rank of Kuglish historians. His fidelity and industry—distilities which form the foundation of historical merit—are universally acknowledged. It has been doubted, and it is doubted at the could ponetrate.

the first rank of English historians. His indelity and industry-qualities which form the foundation of historical merit—are universally acknowledged. It has been doubted, and it is doubtful, whother his powers of philosophical analysis were equal to his skill in synthetical arrangement,—whether he could ponetrate to vital principles as happily as he could marshal facts and picture events. It is certain that the latter portions of the duly of an laterian were those to which he specially applied himself. His practice may be justified on the ground of the subdivision of literary labour which at present obtains, greatly to the advantage of the accuracy of our knowledge. To describe clearly what was done in a particular age, and how it was done, is in itself an important and difficult task; to show why it was done, by discovering the hidden causes which shaped and coloured events, belongs perhaps more properly to writers who take a more comprehensive view of the chart of the world's history. In the art of marrative Mr. Prescott had fow rivals—very few equals—in our language. So pure and idiomatic is his English that it is rarely indeed that the most critical ear detects, in the use of a word or the construction of a phrase, the transutiantic origin of the writer. . . Mr. Prescott's chapters on manners and literature are not less lively and picture-sque than his rocord of contemporary events which these chapters illustrate. Of modern historians he was one of the first to acknowledge and to axhibit the importance of this kind of illustration, which his immediate predecessors had been too much in the habit of neglecting. In another respect also his works set an example well worky of general adoption. Not content with embedying the result of his own researches, he constructed a road to the foundains from which he had drawn and the mines in which he had tolled, in order, to use his own words, 'to put the reader in a position for judging for himself, and thus for revising, and, if need be, of reversing, the judgments of t

Compare what he has written with the most of what others have left on the same subjects, and Prescott's au periority beams upon you from the contrast. The easy flow of his language, and the faultiess lucidity of his style, may make the reader forget the unremitting toil which the narrative has cost; but the critical inquiror sees everywhere the fruits of investigation rigidity and most perseveringly pursued, and an investigation rigidity and most perseveringly pursued, and an investigation rigidity and soundness of judgment which give authority to every statement and weight to every conclusion."—George Bancaor: Proceedings New York Hist. PRESCOTT'S CHARACTERISTICS AS A MAN.

In the consideration of the literary characteristics of Mr. Prescott, we were obliged to omit much which we would have gladly quoted, and in this part of our subject, too, want of space must enforce brevity. To read, that we might write, men's lives, has been our vocation for years: we have seldom found the record so clear, so bright, -we have rarely encountered such touching testimonies of love and reverence to the best qualities of humanity,—as in the present instance. At the solemn convocation of the literary brothren of the deceased, an assemblage perhaps the most distinguished which the New World has yet seen,—one of his daily associates—one, too, who had known him from his early years—called all who had been equally fortunate to bear witness that, one, too, who had known him from his early years—called all who had been equally fortunate to bear witness that, "to those who knew him from the days of his bright boyhood down to his latest years, when he stood before the world crowned with its honours, the elements that constituted the peculiar charm of his character seemed always to be the same; that his life—his whole life—was . . . governed by a prevalent sense of duty to God and love to man; and that he has been taken from us . . with a heart whose affections grow warmer and more truder to the last."—Grongs Ticknor: Proceedings, &c. Mass. Hist. Soc., Feb. 1, 1859, vil. See, also, Ticknor's Hist. of Spanish Literature, Pref., x.

"Of all the men whom I have known," remarked one of his classmates, on the same occasion, "I have never known one so little changed by the conventionalities of society and the hard trial of success and prosperity. At college, and on the morning of the day he died, he was the same in his dispositions; the same in his outward manners; the same in his habits of thought and feeling; the same, to a remarkable degree, even in his attitudes and looks. If was because his character was a true and real character. . . He was one of the happy few whom all love to hear praised. . . The shadow of death is upon us; but it is a beautiful and accomplished life which we are called to consider, and it will do us good to pander it well."—REV. Dz. Walken, President of Harvard University.

"I know not in what words to speak of Prescott. He was my oldest friend, and their intimacy foil to us as an inheritance. His genial face, and that cordial manner which was but the transparent vesture of his constant kindenss, I shall meet no more. . . . Nor need I add my testimony to the universal recognition of the ability, the industry, the accurate learning, the admirable judgment, and the perfect tate which have piaced him at the head of our literature and made him our pride."—Theoritune Passons, Lif.D., Law Professor Harvard University: Memoir of Chief-Juntice record:

Such is the testimony (and much more is before us) of intimate and life-long associates; and those who saw him every day, and all day, confirm the truth of the record:

"The distinguishing traits of Mr. Prescott's personal character"—it is his private secretary, Mr. Robert H. Cartor, who thus writes—"were all agreeable ones. In daily intercourse of the most intimate kind, during a whole year, I never perceived any thing angleanant in his conduct or disposition. Though not at all diffident, he was singularly modest and unassuming. He had not a particle of arrogance or haughtiness. It required the closest scrutiny to detect that he had any share of the nistural vanity of man. Praise did not elate him, nor censure disturb him. He read all the criticisms upon his works, favourable and unfavourable, and was always eages to profit by any suggestious of improvement. . . Of Mr. Prescott's hencotence to the suffering and the destitute—a hencotence, however, which is almost a universal characteristic in the highest class of Bostons society—I could cite many striking instances, if it were proper to speak to private affairs. . . He carried his kindliness of disposition not only into his public but into his private writing. In the hundreds of letters, many of the most confidential character, treating freely of other authors, and of a great variety of persons, which I wrote at his dictation, not a single unitable or harsh of smearing expression occurs. He would write him.

thing of a man which he would not say to his face. He would not faster, and, if he could not honostly prairs, he said nothing. He was very warmly attached to his friends, and constant in his attachments, and would never permit any thing to be said against them in their absence.

Mr. Prescotts cheerthiness and annuability were truly admirable. He had a finely wrought, sensitive organization he was high pointed, courageous, resolute, melependent, was free from cant or affectation of any sert Vet no annuyance, great or small the most puniful illness or the most intolerable bore, centld disturt his equanimity or render him in the least degree sullen of freithi, or discourteous. He was always gay good humoured, and many most greate and affectionate to his family, most kind and greatous to all around him. This made him a peculiarly delighting can amon, and I look to the year 1 preset in his service as the most agreeable in my life. Present Mimorial xxiii. Xxii.

Well, therefore, is it affirmed by his distinguished foreign biographer-also a personal friend of the subject foreign biographer—also a personal friend of the subject of his interesting sketch,—

His cumione as a writer was not more ectivally recognized than the remarkable worth and beauty of his character as a man. In a preceding extract from the sketch from which we have just quo al Mr Stilling refers to the willingness with which Mr Prescott was went to welcome an unknown fellow lateurer to the temple of Fame. Of this nobility of disposition we have a well told instance in a letter from Mr J I othrop Metley to Mr Amory, Mr Prescott's brother in law respecting a work noticed en an carlier page bo far from discouraging an enterprise Mr Motley a projected History of the Rise of the Dutch Republic--which it was fcared the prospective author of the Life of Philip the Second might consider an invasion of a portion of his own territory, Mr. Prescott urged his visitor in the warmest and most carnest manner to pro-ceed on the course he had marked out for himself," "wished him every success, and stated that if there were any bocks in his library bearing on his subject they were entirely at his service 2 a may not remember the circumstances, which however, I have often mentioned to you, remarks Mr Motley to his correspondent, "but, when I forget them, I hepe that my right hand may forget its cunning ' "You know, be continues, "how kindly he always spoke of and to me, and the generous manner in which, without the slightest hint from me and entirely unexpected by me, he attracted the eyes of his ho-ts of readers to my forthcoming work by so handsomely alluding to it in the preface to his own [Philip the Se cond] must be almost as trush in your memory as it is in mine ' See Proceed Mass Hist Soc 1859-60, 266, 431

Here we take up the story greatly impressed with the ments of Mr Mothy's History, and suvious to do justice to those merits in this volume, when shout recording the judgments of eminent critics on the Ruse of the Dutch Republic, we asked Mr Prescott for his opinion of a work which, in advance of its completion, he had so courteously introduced to the public. His cordial response has been already recorded on a preceding page

Something more we would have said respecting this characteristic trait of Mr Prescott, of the graceful and gracious manner in which, in the maturity of his well-earned honours and world wide fame, the historian of two hemispheres would encourage the unknown aspirant te laterary honours to perseverance in the struggle of honourable ambition,—in efforts designed to enlarge the domain of useful knowledge, or to record, for the benefit of later generations the achievement of later generations, the achievements of solence and the triumphs of letters, ("alas" we feel we are no actors here!") something we could have said drawn from our own experience.

Even this imperfect and faltering testimony may be deemed searcely delicate, but we had rather that others should accuse of estentation than that our own heart should accuse of estentation than that our own heart should convict us of ingratitude. Of the friendly and lively interest evinced from the first, by the departed, in the libours of one who had no claim upon his consideration, we trust we shall never cease to be mindful.

Thus, leving and beloved, happy and bestowing happiness, in life, he is honoured and lemented in feath, and ble name shall be held in grateful remembrance in all future generations. Had his family given only him to the Republic, it had been much, but so long as the sword, the ermine, and the pen are connected with the story of American civilization, so long shall the memory of three generations of Prescotts be dear to the hearts of the American people correspondence between Dr. Price and Dr. Priestley:

"In his controversy with Priestley particularly he showed how strongly he viewed the philosophical aberration of the age, and how carnestly he desired to place moral and metaphysical truth upon its deeper and truer foundation. . . Almost the only writer of this (the rationalistic) school whose works are likely to form a part of our standard philosophy, is Dr. Richard Price."—Morell: see No. 1.

In this high estimate of the merits of Price's philoso-

In this high estimate of the merits of Price's philoso-phical writings, Mr. Morell is not singular:

"He investigated with acuteness and ability many important questions relative to morals, and controverted the doctrine of a floral Sense, as irreconcilable with the unalterable character of moral ideas, which, as well as those of Substance and Cause, he maintained to be eternal and original principles of the intel-lect itself, independent of the Divine Will."—TENNEMAN: M

"If in England you only look at London in the eighteenth century, you will doubtless there see little else than sensualism. But even at London you would find, by the side of Priestley, Price, that ardent friend of liberty, that ingenious and profound economist, who renewed and brilliantly sustained the Platonic idealism of Cudworth. I know that Price is an isolated phenomens at London; but the whole Scotch school is more or less spiritualistle."—Cours: ut supra.

But Mackintosh (ut supra) by no means shares in this anthusiasm: nor can it be expected that the admirers enthusiasm; nor can it be expected that the admirers of Looke should discover much merit in his opponent. Bir James's estimate of the characteristics of Price will SIT James's estimate of the characteristics of Price will be found in the Edinburgh Review, June, 1815, 171-172, and has been already cited: see Morgan's William, No. 3, also Nos. 1 and 2. Morgan's Memoirs of Price are also noticed in London Monthly Review, lxxxii. 77, and Beston Christian Disciple, ii. 134. Although unfortunate in his grand panacea for financial consumption,—the amous Sinking-Fund Scheme, (see Edin. Rev., xxxix.

32-34; Galm, S.; Hawteron, Robert, Mt.D., No. 3.) Price alleges that Pitt selected the worst of the three schemes he offered him,—his souteness as a political arithmetician is not to be questioned. His personal character was most exemplary, (see Mrs. Chappie's Mis-cellanies.) and his controversial manners a model to sealous disputants.

The historian of the Roman Empire, in writing to Lord Sheffield respecting the French Revolutionists of 1789, thus refers to our scalous advocate of political and religious freedom:

He was a devoted student of Welsh literature, and did much to endear it at home and recommend it abroad. He pub. in 1829, 8vo, An Essay on the Physiognomy and Physiology of the Present Inhabitants of Britain, with Reference to their Origin as Goths and Celts. principal work is the Hanes Cymrn a chenedl y Cymry or cynocsoedd hyd at Furwolaeth Llewelyn ap Gruffydd, (History of Wales and the Welsh Nation from the Early Ages to the Death of Llewelyn ap Gruffydd,) when the country was united with England. His history (which should be in connection with the histories of Wales in English by Warrington and Woodman) was issued in fourteen numbers, (about 800 pages in all,) 1836-42. Another work of Mr. Price's, which attracted considerable attention, was The Geographical Progress of Empire and Civilization, (Llandovery, 1847-48,) a portion of which appeared in the London Athenseum for 1844, (see Nos. 894, 895,) and was republished in the Allgemeine Zeitung. A notice of this work will be found in the Athenœum for 1847, 1051. He contributed, chiefly under the signature of Carnhuanawe, to fifteen Welsh periodi-cals, and warmly encouraged the Eisteddfods, or literary and musical gatherings of his countrypeople. Of his English works the most important will be found in vol. i. (1854) of the Literary Remains of Rev. Thomas Price, with a Memoir of his Life, by Jane Williams, Ysgafell, Llandovery, 2 vols. 8vo. Vol. ii. (185b) is occupied with Miss Williams's Memoir, which—and the first volume also—every one interested in Welsh literature (the number of such is disgracefully small in Great Britain) should peruse. Vol. i. is briefly noticed in the Athenseum, 1854, 1587, and in the Literary Gazette, 1854, 905; and vol. il. in Lon. Athen, 1855, 1331, and Lon. Lit. Gaz., 1835, 775. A memoir of Mr. Price will be found in London Gent. Mag., Fob. 1849, 212. "Dr. Prichard, in his valuable and learned Researches into the Physical History of Mankind, &c."—A. H. Lavard, D.C.L.: Ninereh and its Remains, ed. 1949, it. 241, n.

"Dr. Prichard, in his great work on the Natural History of Man, has constructed a powerful and conclusive argument for the derivation of the whole human species from one stock. If the unity of the race is not to be made out genealogically because profune history does not ascend so high as to meet the historical nervative of Moses in reference to Gientile nations, he demonstrates that unity by the fact that it is essential to the nature of man."—Rev. In 1752 he entered the Dissenting Academy at Daventry, (afterwards Coward College;) in 1755 be-came minister to a congregation at Needham-Market, Suffolk; from 1758 to 1761 officiated as minister and schoolmaster at Nantwich, Cheshire; from 1761 to 1767 was tutor in the languages and belies-lettres at Warrington Academy; in 1767 became pastor of Mill-Ilill Chapel, Leeds; from 1773 to 1780 was librarian and literary companion to the Earl of Shelburne, (afterwards first Marquis of Lansdowne,) at a salary of £250 and a retiring pension for life of £150; and in 1780 became minister to the principal Dissenting congregation at Birmingham. In principal Dissenting congregation at Birmingnam. In 1790 he irritated the populace by his Familiar Letters to the Inhabitants of Birmingham, advocating the claims of the Dissenters; and in 1791 he again aroused public animosity by his justification of the French Revolution in his Letters to Edmund Burke, occasioned by Burke's Reflections on the Revolution in France. The 14th of July in the last-named year was observed by Priestley's friends—he was not himself present at the entertainment—by a festival in commemoration of the destruction of by a festival in commomeration of the destruction of the Eastille. The dinner-party was disturbed by a mob whick destroyed the tavern, and the next day many edificate were pillaged and burnt. Of course Priestley's shapel and house were prominent objects of attack. As, however, an supple, subscription was made for him, and as his brother-in-law generously gave him £10,000, with an annuity of £300 for life, he could not be other than a large gainer by the execrable skilence of which he had been the victim; and, as he never allowed any of his wriftings to remain unpublished for even the shortest time after they were finished, it is not likely that any loss of an irreparable kind was incurred by the burning of his papers,"—Loan Bacucanas: Liere of Philosophers of the Tune of George III., ed. 1850, 83-34: Priestley.

Priestley now removed to Hackney, where he succeeded his friend Dr. Richard Price (supra) in the pastoral office, and also in the post of Principal of the Hackney Academy. His situation, however, did not prove an agreeable one, and in 1794 he determined to follow his sons, who had settled in America. He arrived at New York on the 4th of June of that year; declined the pre-York on the 4th of June of that year; declined the pro-fessorship of chemistry in the University of Pennayl-vania, at Philadelphia; in July settled at Northumberland, Pennsylvania, where he assisted his son in farming 300 acres of land, and here chiefly resided, making occasional excursions to Philadelphia and other places, until his death in 1804. He declined the offer of $1000 for a course of Lectures on Experimental Philosophy to be delivered in Philadelphia, but often preached in that city, and occasionally at Northumberland. In 1796 and 1797 he delivered in Philadelphia two Series of Discourses relating to the Evidences of Revealed Beligion, which were pub. in that city in the same years in 2 vol-umes 8vo, (one of these was dedicated to John Adams;) and in 1797 he pub. at Phila. a 12mo tract of 38 pages, entitled Outline of the Evidences of Revealed Religion.

entitled Outline of the Evidences of Revealed Religion.

"In America he again suffered considerable disappointment. His religion was too much for those who had ceased to care for sacred things, and far too scanty for those who still were Christians,—while his republican opinions were exceedingly distanteful, because they were tinged with a decided admiration for France. . . . We find his leanings are all against the Federal party, and his censures of the great Chief of the Union little concealed. He felt for the Democratic party, the French alliance, the enemies of English partialities, and he regarded Washington as ungrateful because he would not, from a recollection of the services of France twenty years before to American independence, consent to make America dependent upon France, "Lean Broughan: ubt supra, 84, 87,

"The Memoirs are written with great conciseness and simplicity, and present a very singular picture of that indefatigable activity, that bigoted vasity, that precipitation, cheerfulness, and sincerity, which used on the character of this restless philosopher. . . The Coutinuation by his son is more diffuse and languid, though the detail of his father's last days be interesting and satisfactory. . . The Observations annexed by Mr. Cooper are the work, we think, of a powerful, preaumptinue, and untractable understanding. They are written in a defying, deguatical, unaccommodating style; with much force of reusening for the most part, but often with great rashness and arrogence; and occasionally with a cant of philosophism, and a tang of party politics, which communicate an air of vulgarity to the whole work, and irresiatibly excite a smile at the expose of this magnanimous despiser of all sorts of prejudice and bigotry."—Lobb Jayraky: Edia. Pricatley, who had in his Letters, No. 28, offered some Animadversions on the two last chapters of the first volume of Gibbon's History, sent a copy of his History of the Corruptions of Christianity, &c. to the historian. The letter which accompanied it displeased the latter, and led to a correspondence between the parties, which Priestley, against Gibbon's protest, most dishonourably, published soon after Gibbon's death, and exhibited before that event. See Gibbon's Miscell. Works, ed. 1837, 98, 309-313. Priestley certainly appears to but little advantage in the affair:

vantage in the affair:

"The minister of the gospel had all the heat to himself: at least in the layman it was latent, if it existed at all. He was desirous of drawing his adversary buto a controversy, and, failing in this, lost his temper, and had the vulgar recourse to calling names and imputing motives. Mr. Gibbon may have shown some superclinouses in his treatment of this angry polemic; but he certainly had a good right to marvel at the intolerance of one whose heterodexy was so universal as to condemn ("overthrow," Gibbon has it by circumscribing the inepiration of the Evangelists, and to condemn the religion of every Christian nation, as a faitheless innocent, not less abourd, than Mahomet's journey to the third heaven."—Load Brougham. Philos., dec., 82.

The historian, indeed, would have no "countroverse".

The historian, indeed, would have no "controversy" with the petulant philosopher; but he took a terrible revenge for his impertinence; at the close of the 54th chapter of the Decline and Fall he remarks,

"The friends of Christianity are alarmed at the boundless impulse of inquiry and skepticism.... The pillars of revelation are shaken by those men who preserve the name without the substance of religion, who induigo the heens without the tempart of hillographe." per of philosophy;" and thus in the face of the world he superscribes this formidable indictment:

II. PRIESTLEY THE NATURAL PHILOSOPHER.

"To enumerate Dr. Priestley's discoveries would in fact be to enter into a detail of most of those that have been made within the last fifteen years. How many invisible fluids whose existence evaded the sagacity of foregoing ages has he made known to us! The very air we breathe he has taught us to analyze, to examine, to improve; a substance so little known that even the precise effect of respiration was an enigma until he explained it. He first made known to us the proper food of vegetables, and in what the difference between these and animal substances consisted. To hist pharmacy is indebted for the method of making artificial waters, as well as for a shorter mothod of preparing other medicines, metallurgy for more powerful and cheap softents, and chemistry for such a variety of discoveries as it would be tedious to recite,—discoveries which have new-modelled the actiones, and drawn to it and to this country the attention would be tedious to recite,—discoveries which have new-modelled the science, and drawn to it and to this country the attention of all Europe. It is certain that since the year 1773 the eyes and regards of all the beared bodies of Europe have been directed to this country by his means. In every philosophical treatise late name is to be found, and in almost every page. They all own that most of their discoveries are due either to the repe-tifion of his discoveries or to the limits scattered through his works."—DR. Richtan Kriwan.

"In his scientific career his object was uniformly to question nature by every possible experimental investigation, and to state his results as he obtained them. He hald the basis of the chemistry of the guess, and of those modes of investigation in the parameter branch of the science which are still pursued. He discovered a great variety of facts in this department of the science. To him we are indebted for the knowledge of oxygen, knowlede of nitrogen, sulphurous acid, fluosilicic acid, muriatic acid, morning, carburetted hydrogen, and carbonic acid,"—Ds. R. B. Tanasox.

"Though his chemical experiments were for the most part accurate, they did not exhibit that precise chemical knowledge which distinguished the experiments of some of his contemporaries. He never attempted to discover the constituents of his gates, nor their specific gravity, nor any other numerical result."
—Da. Thomas Thomson.

He entered the laboratory with but little preparation: "When I began my experiments," he remarks, "I knew very little of chemistry, and had, in a manner, no idea of the subject before I attended a course of lectures at an academy where I taught."

As late as 1795, the year after his refusal of the pro-fessorship of chemistry in the University of Pennsylvania,

As late as 1795, the year after his refusal of the professorship of chemistry in the University of Pennsylvania, he observes, in a letter,

"As to chemical locureship, I am now convinced I could not have sequitted myself in it to proper advantage. . . . Though I have made many discoveries in some brunches of chemistry, I never gave much attention to the common routine of it, and know but little of the common processes."

"He had great merit in the contrivane of his apparatus, which was simple and next to a degree that has nover been equalled, and the indefatigable industry with which he pursued his researches would entitle him to still higher praise if he had combined with it the patience and forecast by which so much labour may be saved. The truth is, however, that he was always too much occupied with making experiments to have lolaure either to plan them beforehand with philosophic procision, or to combine their results afterwards into systematic conclusions. He was so impatient to be doing that he could spare no time for thinking, and arroneously imagined that science was to be fortwarded rather by accumulating facts than by meditating on those that were ascertained."—Loan Jarrarr: Edin. Rev., Oct. 1996, iz. 150.

"On the whole, from Dr. Priestley's conversation, and from his writings, one is not much disposed to consider him as person of first-rate abilities. The activity rather than the force of his gamins is the object of admiration. He is indefatigable in making experiments, and he compensates by the numbers of them for the same substitution of the substitution of the more of the more substitution of the substitution of the substitution of the more substitution of the more substitution of the substitution of science, was the section of substitution of the substitution of science, was the section of substitution of science, was the substitutio

"Priestley's mind was objective to an extreme: he could fix his faith upon nothing which had not the evidence of sonse in some way or other impressed upon it. Science, morals, politics, philosophy, religion, all came to him under the type of the sensational. The most spiritual ideas were obliged to be cast'into a material mould before they could commend themselves to his judgment or conscience. His intellect was rapid to an extraordinary degree; he saw the bearings of a question according to his own principles at a glance, and embodied his thoughts in volumes whilst many other men would hardly have sketched out their plan. All this, though admirable in the man of action, was not the temperament to form the solid metaphysician; nay, it was precisely opposed to that deep reflective habit, that sinking into one's own immost consciousness, from which alone speculative philosophy can obtain light and advancement."—Moretl's Hist. of Mod. "If we view him as a critic, a metaphysician, and a divine, we must confine ourselves to a more scanty praise. In his controversy with Dr. Reid, though he has said many things that are true, he has shown himself wholly incapable of understanding true, he has shown himself wholly incapable of understanding the principal point in debate; and whon he affirmed [see Harrer, David, M.D., p. 795, ante] that the vague and unsatisfactory speculations of Hartley have thrown as much light on the nature of man as the reasonings of Sir Isaac Newton did on the nature of the body, he can hardly be allowed to understand in what true philosophy consists. As to his theology, it is enough to say that he denies the immateriality of the soul, though he coales for the soul though the coal seconds for the soul that the second seconds for the soul that the second s tonds for its immortality and ranges himself on the side of Christianity. These inconsistencies and absurditles will per haps deprive him of the name of a philosopher, but he will still merit the name of a useful and diligont experimenter."

"His character is a matter of no doubt, and it is of a high order. That he was a most sule, most industrious, most successful student of nature is clear; and that his name will forever be held in grateful remembrance by all who cultivate physical science, and placed almong those of its most eminent masters, is unquestionable. That he was a perfectly conscientious man in all the opinions which he embraced, and sincere in all he published worself-section and in the state of the state unquestionable. That he was a perfectly conscientious man in all the opinions which he embraced, and senere in all he published respecting other subjects, appears equally beyond dispute. He was also upright and honourable in all his dealings, and justly beloved by his family and friends as a man aporties in all the relations of life. That he was governed in his public conduct by a temper too hot and irritable to be consistent either with his own dignity or with an amiable deportment, may be freely admitted; and his want of silf-command, and want of judgment in the practical affairs of life, was manifest above all in his controversial history; for he can be charged with no want of prudence in the management of his private concerns. His violence and tritability, not, seem quality to have been confined to his public life, for in private all have allowed him the praise of a mild and attractive demeasour; and we have just seen [interview with a Calvinistic divine in Penneylvania] its great power in disarming the prejudices of his adversarion. Low Brownan: Pales, dec. 89-80. See, also, 69, 86, 66.

"Dr. Priestley, after he had abjured the Holy Ghost, and satisfied himself that Jeans Christ was nothing more than a man, that the soul of man had no existence, retained the same devout passion for preaching, praying, and catchising, which had be acquired while he believed in the Trinity and the immederately of the sentient principle of his nature. We have already said that we believe him to have been sincere in the singular profession of faith which he promulgated; and therefore we are constrained to respect his endeavours to confirm and recommend it. But it is impossible not to regret the presumption and infatuation by which he seems to have been guided; and we are a fraid that the theological specifiations of a man of great forming, sagacity, industry, and devotion, are at this day an offence to the serious, and a jest to the profane."—Loss Jer-Pary: Edin. Rec., Oct. 1806, ix. 137, 161.

"Priestley was a good man, though his life was too busy to leave him leisure for that refinement and ardour of moral sentiments which have been felt by men of less blanneless inte. Frankses and disinterestedness in the avowal of his opinion were his point of honour. In other respects his morality was not brilliant. But the virtue of the sentimental margilat is no average.

hass and disinterestedness in the avowal of his opinion were me point of honour. In other respects his morality was not brilliant. But the virtue of the sentimental moralist is so over-precarious and osteniations, that he can seldom be entitled to look down with contempt on the steady though homely morals of the household."—Sir J. Mackintosii, Spf. 13, 1807, Life, i., abon will

Dr. Johnson's verdict on Priestley's theological writings has been already cited in this article: his opinion of his probity and learning will be found in our notice of Rev. Samuel Badcock, (p. 98, ante.) and an amusing instance of the triumph of the lexicographer's candour over his prejudices with respect to the same obnoxious philosopher is recorded in the 77th chapter of Boswell's memoir. Mathias's unfavourable comments (in Pursuits of Lit., Dialogue First, &c.) have also been already noticed in this article. A lively sketch of Pricetley as a man, a theologian, and a philosopher occurs in the London Quarterly Review for Dec. 1812, 425-431; and one far less temperate in tone appeared in Blackwood's Magazine for Sept. 1835, 362-365. From the latter we quote a few lines more commendable for vigour of style than politeness of language:

politeness of language:

"A man frenzied for novelty, ambitious of a name, precipitate in the publication of every change of a capricious mind, and utterly careless of the inischief effected by his unprincipled notoricty. As a scholar shallow, as a politician malcontent, and as a religionist heretical, he has long since sunk into the contempt which every man of sense feels for pretensions without solidity, and the desire of public mischief defeated only by gidly impotence of mind."—302. The eloquent commendation of Robert Hall will have more weight with most readers than the eulogy just quoted:

"The religious tenets of Dr. Priestley appear to me erromeous in the extreme; but I should be sorry to suffer any diffurence of sentiment to diminish my sensibility to virtue or my admiration of sentiment to diminish my sensibility to virtue or my admiration of genius. His enlightened and active mind, his unwearied assiduity, the extent of his researches, the light he poured into almost every department of science, will be the admiration of that period, when the greater part of those who have opposed him will be alike forgotten. Distinguished merit will ever rise superior to oppression, and will draw lustre from reproach. The vapours which gather round the rising sun, and follow in its course, reddom fall at the close of it to form a magnifecent thater for its reception, and to invest with variegated tinta, and with a softened similarence, the luminary which they cannot hide."

For this admirable evidence of generous candour Mr. Hall did not escape censure; and of this he was informed by an acquaintance in the course of conversation, (see that did not escape in the course of conversation, (see the grave indictment, and thus answered it in a spirit

Pringle, Thomas, 1789-1834, a native of Blaiklaw, Teviotdale, Scotland, had the misfortune in infancy to dislocate his hip-joint, in consequence of which he was obliged to carry crutches for life. About 1796 he entered the University of Edinburgh, and on the completion of his studies became a clerk to the Commissioners on the Public Records of Scotland. In 1811, in conjunction with a friend, he pub. a poem called The Iustitute; in 1816 was a contributor to Albyn's Anthology and to the Poetic Mirror,—in which he printed a poem composed in imitation of the style, and which secured the praise and friendship, of Sir Walter Scott; in 1817 became co-editor with James Cleghorn of the Edinburgh Monthly Magazine, (after No. vi. styled Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazinc,) and in the same year was connected editorially with the Edinburgh Star (semi-weekly) newspaper, and Constable's Edinburgh (formerly The Scots) Magazine; in 1820, in company with twenty-three others, including his father and his two brothers, emigrated to South Africa, and there (at Cape Town) kept a school and published and edited the South African Journal, and edited the South African Commercial Advertiser, until they were discontinued in consequence of difficulties with the Governor; returned to London in 1826, became editor Governor; returned to London in 1826, became editor of Friendship's Offering, and (in 1827) Secretary to the Anti-Slavery Society, which office he retained until the abolition of slavery in the West Indies, June 27, 1834, less than six months before his death. Pringle gave to the world the following volumes. I. Some Account of English Settlers in Albany, South Africa, Lon., 1824, 1270. 12mo.

Prior, Matthew, July 21, 1664—Sept. 18, 1731, a native of Abbet Street, one mile from Wimborne Minster, Dorsetshire, on the death of his father was adopted by his uncle. Samuel Prior, landlord of the Rummer Tween. Dornetshire, on the death of his father was adopted by his uncle, Samuel Prior, landlord of the Rummer Tavern, at Charing Cross, who sent him for some time to Dr. Busby at Westminster School, and then removed him to the tap-room, with the hope that the youth would take a lively interest in supplying the wants of the gentlamin of fashion and letters who patronized this respectable "public." But better things were in store for the guide.

who had already contracted an intimacy with the classics which was destined to serve him in good stead. If Horace has lured many a man into the tavern, it must not be denied that he took one out. The story runs as follows:

denied that he took one out. The story ruus as follows:

At leisnre moments he pureued its study of the classics, on which account he was soon noticed by the politic company who resorted to his uncle's house. It happened one day that the Earl of Dorset and other gentlemen being at this tavern, the discodure turned upon a passage in an ode of Horace, who was Prior's favourite author; and the company being divided in their sentiments, one of the gentlemen said, 'I find we are not like to agree in our criticisms; but if I am not mistaken there is a young fullow in the house who is able to act as all right.' Upon which he named Matt. Prior, who, being called in, gave the company the satisfaction they wanted. Lord Dorset, exceedingly struck with his ingenuity and learning, from that moment determined to remove him from the sation he was in to one more suitable to his talents and genius; and accordingly procured him to be sent, in 1882, to St. John's College, in Cambridge, where he proceeded B.A. in 1880, and was shortly after shoes Fellow."

In 1687 he gained some reputation by his share in The Country Mouse and the City Mouse, folio, already noticed, (see Montagu, or Montague, Charles, Earl of Halifax,) a burlesque of Dryden's Hind and Panther, and about the same time he wrote his peem on The Deity. —an offering presented, according to the custom of his college, to the family of the Earl of Essex. His generous patron, Lord Dorset, still retained an interest in his welfare, and after the Revolution of 1688, by an introduction to the new court, placed him in the way to the successive promotions by which he was honoured. He was appointed Secretary to the English Embassy sent to the Congress at the Hague in 1690, and was shortly afterwards chosen a Centleman of the Bedchamber by King William; presented the monarch with an Ode on the Death of Queen Mary, in 1695, folio, and with Verses the Death of Queen Mary, in 1695, follo, and with Verses on a Couspiracy against his Most Sacrod Person, in 1695, follo; pub. his English Ballad in Answer to Mr. Despreaux's [Boileau's] Pindarique Odo on the Taking of Namur, 1695; Secretary to the English Embassy which concluded the peace of Ryswick, 1697, and in 1698 filled the same post at the court of France; Under-Becretary of State, 1699; a Commissioner of Trade, 1700, and in the same year published his Carmen Seculare, a panogyric on King William, folio; M.P. for East Grinstead, 1701, and shortly afterwards left the Whigs and joined the Tories; in 1704 pub. his Letter to Monsieur Boileau Despreaux, occasioned by the Victory at Blenheim, [Anon.,] folio; in 1706 gave to the world his ode heim, [Anou.] fulfo; in 1706 gave to the world his ode (inscribed to Queen Anne) in honour of the battle of Ramillies: in 1707 (2d ed., 1709) pub. an octave vol. of Poema, and in 1712, 8vo, Two Imitations of Chaucer; in July, 1711, sent privately to Paris with proposals of peace; returned with the Abbé Gaultier and M. Mesnager, French Plenipotentiary, and brought the English ministers and Mesnager together privately at his own house, Sept. 20th, 1711; with Bolingbroke at Paris, on diplomatic business connected with the conferences at Utrecht, Jan. 1712, and after his lordship's return acted as ambassador until August 1, 1711, when the Whigs succeeded the Tories in power; thrown into prison in 1715, on a charge of high treason, based on the secret interview above referred to, and remained in confinement for two years, (during which he wrote his poem of Alma,) for two years, (during which he wrote his poem of Alma,) when he was discharged without trial; pub. his poems (instituting Solomon) by subscription, 1718, folio, by which he gained four thousand guineas, to which au equal amount was added by Lord Harley for the purchase of Down Hall, which Prior was to enjoy for life; in 1720 pais, amonymously, his last work,—Conversation: a Tale, 1916; died at Wimpole, a seat of the Karl of Oxford, (Harlay Tather, in Cambridgeshie Nationales 120) (Harley's father,) in Cambridgeshire, September 18, 1721, and left £500 for a monument to be erected in Westminnier Abber. He has great variety, and the variety hear mad him popular. He has be distinctly considered as comprising Tales, Love-Verses, Occasional Pooms, 'Alma,' and 'Solomon.' His Tales have obtained general approbation, being written with great familiarity and great sprightliness; the language is easy, but seldom gross, and the numbers amooth, without appearance of care. Of these tales there are only four. . . I know not whether he be the original author of any tale which he has given us. . . . In his amorous officians as the coldness of Cowley without his with the dull excress the passion of the coldness of Cowley without his with the dull excress thing about Chilos and trying to be amorous by dut of study. Itin factions, therefore, are mythological. . . The greatest of all his amorous essays is "Henry and famma," a dull and teclous dialogue, which excites neither exteem for the man nor tendernose for the woman. . . . His occasional poems, necessarily lose part of their value, as their occasions, being less remembered, raised less emotion. Some of them, however, are preserved by their inherent excellence. . . . 'Alma' is written in professed imitation of Hadiluras, and has at lesses on accidental rosenblance: Ifindibras wants a plan, because it is loft imperfect, including the control of the control of the control of his name, and which he expected succeeding ages to regard with veneration of any other spent, and other processes in the th

In Boswell's life of the controversialist, edition of 1843, r. Sra, the first on page 201, and the last on page 559, a The heat of what we copied from the Continental poets, on this described in the lighter please of Prior. That tone of politic raillory,—that airy, rapid, picture-que narrative, mixed up of wit and safetet,—that style, in short, of good conversation, concentrated into flowing and polithed verses,—was not within the vein of our native poets, and probably never would have been known among us if we had been left to our own resources. It is lumentable that this, which alone was worth horrowing, is the only thing which has not been retained. The tales and little apologues of Prior are still the only examples of this style in our language,—Lord Jerrary: Elin. Rec., Adg. 1811, xviit. 221, and in his Contrib. to Balin. Rev., 1853, 380.

4 Prior has left no single work equal to Gay's Fables or the Reggats' Opera. But in his lyrical and fugitive pieces he has shown even more genius, more playfulness, more mischlevous gaiety. No one has exceeded him in the laughing grace with which he glances at a subject that will not bear examining, with which he gently hints at what cannot be directly insisted on, with which he not concealed him in the laughing grace with which he gently hints at what cannot be directly insisted from some of the Muse's accet mysteries. His Muse is, in fact, a giddy, wanton firit, who spends her time in playing at sangergon and biladman's-buff, who tells what she should not, and known more than she tells. She laughs at the tricks she shows us, and blushes, or would be thought to do so, at what she keeps concorded. His serious poetry, as his Solomon, is as heavy as his familiar style was light and agreenble.—Hazilit's Lects, on the English Foets, Lect VI. And sea, Blackw. May, it 683.

4 Prior, livoly, familiar, and amusing.—Smollett: Hist. of Engl.: George I., Notes.

4 Prior was one of the last of the race of poets who relied for ornament on scholastic alludion and pagan machinery; but ornament on scholastic allusion and pagan machinery; but he used them, like Swift, more in jest than carnest, and with good effect. In his 'Alma' he contrives even to clothe metaphysics in the gay and colloqual pleasantry which is the characteristic charm of his manner."—Compbell's Specimens.

Cowper (letter to Unwin, March 21, 1784) refuses to believe that Alma was intended as an imitation of Hudibras. Alms, Mr. Rogors assures us, (Recollections, 61,) was a great favourite with C. J. Fox, who repeated many lines of it to his auditor.

"The whole poem, from beginning to end, is one continued place of rideulo upon the various hypotheses of physiologists concerning the nature of the communication between soil and body. The amusing contrast between the solemn abandity of these disputes and the light pleasantry of the excursions to which they lead the facey of the poet, contributes the punchas charm of this performance, by far the most original and characteristical of all Prior's Works."—Dugath Struart: Dissert.

See, also, Blakey's Hist. Philos. of Mind, ii. 229. Mr. Moore's favourite piece is thus referred to in his Memoirs. Moore's favourite piece is thus referred to in his Memoirs. "Lord L[ansdowne] asked me what was the poem of Prior's I had often mentioned to him as very pretty; he had been often trying to recollect it. It was 'Dear Chloe, how blubbered,' &c., &c. We took it down and read it. Nothing can be more gracefully light and gallant than this little peem. I mentioned Lowth's objections to the Lest two lines as ungrammatical, correctness requiring 'than she' and 'than I; but it is far pretter as it is."—Diory, Nov. 1819, vol. ii., 1853, 218.
"I believe that one chief reason for his [John Wesley's] high estimation of Prior among English poets was that he gives so many vivid sketches of man's wretchedness, in spite of all possible contrivances to enjoy life,"—ROBERT SOUTHER: Life of [John] Wesley, 3d ed., ii. 498.

"Johnson speaks slightingly of his lyrics; but, with due deference to the great Samuel, Prior's seem to me among the easiest, the richest, the most charmingly humorous of English lyrical posma. Horace is always in his mind, and his song and his philosophy, his good sente, his happy easy turns and melody, his loves and his Epicureanism, hear a great resemblance to that most delightful and accomplished master."—Tackeray's Bests. on the English Humourists, Prior, Gay, and Prope, Lon., ed. 1898, 17.

See, also, N. York ed., (Charity and Humour,) 1858, 279.

Of the most famous of Prior's "loves," the less said the better., Cowper was a great admirer of the "charming sais" of Prior's verse.

We are told in Spence's Anegdetes that Prior was one of the nine "authorities for poetical lenguage," selected with reference to the design of a new Diotionary, (before the appearance of Johnson's;) and in the same work it is remarked,

Mark Carlo

There are but three poets who have any constant run of popularity now, -- Pope, Prior, and Addison."

At the date at which we write, (1869,) the first only retalks popularity; and, so long as men enjoy disquisitions on morals and strictures on manners, he is not likely to lose it. We have been obliged to hint at a serious defect if character in our poet, but we are more pleased to re-ing to a merit not always found among either poets or officiality, and Prior, we have seen, was both:

"Prior's writings evince less disposition to fituraly jank than those of any anthor of the age."—inn Watern Source of Swift.

To this let it be added (it is by no means offered as a justification) that if Prior's morals were defective his manners were perfect, and that if he loved some "not wisely, but too well," he seems also to have successfully cultivated the affection of others who were more worthy cultivated the affection of others who were more worthy of his esteem. Procter, Adelaide Anne, the daughter of Bryan Procter, Acciance Anne, the daugner of Bryan Waller Procter, (infra,) b. in Bedford Square, London, Oct. 30, 1825, has long been known to many as the "golden-tressed Adelaide" of her father's beautiful poem, set to music by the Chevalier Neukomm, and doubtless sung by many who are now glad to sing Adelaide's own "Lyries." Mr. Willis, who visited her father's margina in Palford Square in 1838 thus refers to the mansion in Bedford Square in 1838, thus refers to the subject of this notice:

"A beautiful girl of eight or nine years, the 'golden-trossed Adelaide,' delicate, gentle, and pensive, as if she was born on the lip of Castaly, and knew she was a poet's child, completed the picture of happiness."—Pencillings by the Why.

After contributing poems to The Book of Beauty, 1843, and Household Words, 1853 et eeg., Miss Proctor gave to the world in May, 1858, fp. 8vo, a volume entitled Le-gends and Lyrics: A Book of Verses,—which was so well received that a second edition was issued in October, Cornwall," under which name (Barry Cornwall, Poet, is an imperfect anagram of Bryan Waller Pructer) all his works have been given to the world. He was born in 1787, educated at Harrow School, Lord Byron and Sir Robert Peel being his contemporaries at that seat of learning; passed some time in the office of a solicitor in Caine, Willshire; subsequently studied law in Lundon, and was called to the Bar, as a member of Gray's Inn, in 1831. He held, for many years previous to his resignation in 1861, when he was succeeded by John Forster, (p. 616, supra,) who had before been Scoretary to the Commission, a lucrative appointment in the court of Chancery as one of the Commissioners of Lunacy; was, we believe, born to a good estate, and certainly inherited we believe, norn to a good cetate, and certainly innerited a handsome legacy from his brother poet and friend, John Kenyon, (see p. 1025, supra.) "Of the following 'Dramatic Scenes,' some were written thirty such the others forty years ago: the first six Scenes (published in 1819 and 1820) being now materially altered and condensed. The Miscellaneous Poems, constituting 'Part the Third' in the present volume, have never before been printed. With the exception of three small pieces of verse, they bear date many years back. They have, however, been corrected, in some instances completed, more recently. In all probability, this work is the last with which I ball try the patience of the public.

"As one time I—in common with other lovers of the charming-latt of Poesy—prepared myself to enter those lists where the Misses are said to sward a wreath to each of the bolder combations that is not infe of labour (my destiny) ensed,—pre-emitting few intervals of leisure, and forcing my thoughts into missisher course.

"If years have not brought the philosophic mind, they have at least quelled those aspirations which are troublesome only he the young; and now led that I ought to dichurthen myself from my armone, and leave to more notive and herole spirits the glory of the struggle, and the crown that awaits success."

But as Mr. Prooter in 1820 (Dedicatory Sounet to a Sicilian Story, No. 2, in/ra) instructed that perhaps he might write no more, and in 1831 (Preface to English Songs, No. 3, infra) made his parting low to the public, we shall still hope for a few more "last appearances."

A notice of the last edition of Dramatic Scenes will be found in the Lon. Athen., Dec. 13, 1856, 1528.

"There is a great deal of the diction of Wordsworth and Coleridge, and some imitation of their beanties; but we think the natural beat of his gonius is more like that of Leigh Hugt than any other author. ... We hope that this is not to be our last needing with Mr. Cornwall."—Long JEFFERY: Edits, Edw., Jan. 1820, 33, 144-156.

"We know of no young poet in our day who stands in a more envisible state than Barry Cornwall. He has done nothing—and he has done much—that he may not easily excel, much that not many will easily equal. We must not, therefore, hour him speaking seriously of giving over bofore he has fairly begun: every-body seems to think kindly and hopefully of him; he has smoothed the face of periodical criticism till it has studied; he has done more than that,—he has acquired the friendship of all true lovers of poetry."—Blackso. "If it be the peculiar province of Poetry to give delight, the author should rank very high among our poets. And, in spite of his neglect of the territie passions, he does rank very high, in our estimation. He has a beautiful fancy, and a beautiful diction, and a fine ear for the music of verse, and great tenderuses and delicacy of feeling. He seems, uporeover, to be altogether free from any incurare of bitterness, rancour, or Joslousy, and uever shocks us with atrocity, or stiffens us with horror, or confounds us with the dreadful sublimities of demoniscal energy. His soul, on the contrary, seems filled to overflowing with Images of love, and beauty, and gentle sorrow, and tender pity, and mild and holy resignation. The character of his postry is to soothe and melt and delight, to make us kind and thoughtful and imaginative, to purge away the dross of our earthly passions by the refining fires of a pure imagination, and to kep us up from the eating cares of life in visions so sooft and bright as to sink like mbruing dreams on our senses, and at the same time so distinct and truly fashioned upon the eternal pattern of nature as to hold their place before our eyes long after they have again been opened on the dimmer scenes of the world."—Load Jappant: Edin. Rev., Nov. 1820, xxxiv. 440-460.

In the concluding lines of this article, Lord Jeffrey

In the concluding lines of this article, Lord Jeffrey announces the fact that Mr. Prooter is employed upon the composition of "an entire tragedy." In the next year it was given to the world, under the title of—4. Mirandols; a Tragedy, 1821, 8vo, 3d cd. same year, and was performed at Covent Garden with great success. See Blackwood's Magazine, viii. 537, (by Dr. Maginn,) xi. 362; Lon. Mon. Rov., xciv. 189. 5. Poetical Works, 1822, 3 vols. 12mo; new ed., 1853, 3 vols. 12mo; N. York, 1856, 2 vols. sm. 8vo. 6. The Flood of Thessaly, The Girt of Provence, and other Poems, Lon., 1823, 8vo. This volume, consured with slight qualifications in Lon. Mon. Rev., ci. 50, was criticised with great severity in Blackwood's Magazine for May, 1823, xiii. 532-541. Indeed, Barry Cornwall had been out of favour in this quarter for some time past, and so continued: see vols. xi. 369; xii. 701; xiv. 491; xvi. 285-289; xvii. 369; xviii. 71-83; xiv. 145-169, 539. If we add to the above, and the vols. before cited, vols. vi. 240, 246, xl. 115-116, (both commendatory,) xiii. 564, xxvii, 633, xxxviii. 257, and vol. xix., Pref., xxvi., xxvii, (where North vindicates his assaults on the poet,) we it was given to the world, under the title of--4. Mirandola; (where North vindicates his assaults on the poet,) we refer to all the notices of our author in this famous p odical. 7. "Byron is a great admirer of the poetry of Barry Cornwall, which he says is full of imagination and beauty, possessing a refinement and delicacy, that whilst they add all the charms of a woman's mind take off none of the force of a man's. He expressed his hope that he would devote himself to tragedy, saying that he was sure he would become one of the first writers of the day."—The Countess of Blessington's Concernations with Lord Byron.

Prynne, William, 1000–1669, a native of Swainswick, near Bath; entered Oriel College, Oxford, 1616; took his degree of B.A. 1620; was called to the Bar in the Society of Lincoln's Inn, and became Bencher and Reader, but gave little time to the practice of the law, though he certainly studied its literature; was a great admirer of the Puritan Lecturer at Lincoln's Inn, Dr. John Preston, and excited the ire of Laud and some of the clergy by several theological tracts advocating doc-trines not in favour with the dominant party; gave to the world in 1633, 4to, his Histrio-Mastix, for which, on the false charge that he intended to libel the queen, (who, the insections of the Landschot, and appeared in a pas-six weeks after its publication, had appeared in a pas-toral at Somerset House,) he was fined £5000, expelled from the University of Oxford and from Lincoln's Inn, degraded from the Bar, set twice on the pillory, lost both his ears, had his book burned before his eyes by the common hangman, and was sentenced to imprisonment for life; still kept up the fire at Archbishop Laud, and in 1636 enraged him by his News from Ipswich, (one sheet 4to,) for which the Star Chamber again fined him £5000, set him on the pillory, condemned him to close confinement for life in Caernarvon Castle, made the hangman hunt up and cut off what was left of his ears, and stamp him on both checks S. L., (intended by his ami-able judges for "Schismatical Libeller," but translated by his unconquerable spirit "Stigmata Laudis,"—a better version: see Bastwick, John, M.D.; Burror, Henry;) in 1640 was released by a warrant from the Speaker of the House of Commons; was shortly afterwards made a Bencher of Lincoln's Inn; took his seat in Parliament as representative for Newport, and conducted the proceedings against Laud; was made Recorder of Bath in 1647, and in the next year zealously advocated a settlement between the king and the Parliament: immediately before the king's trial was ordered into custody, for "denying the supremacy of Parliament" in a pamphlet entitled A Briefe Memento, (1648, 4to, Latin;) Dec. 6, 1648, arrosted by the army, and with others ejected from the House of Commons, attacked Cromwell and the army, and in consequence thereof was imprisoned in 1650, and again in 1651; dismissed from the Recordership of Bath in 1652, but re-elected after the Restoration; early in 1660 returned to the House of Commons as an excluded member, warmly urged the restoration of Charles II., and was elected in March, 1660, to the new Parliament as member for Bath.

"When the king was asked what should be done with Pryane to keep him quiet, 'Why,' said he, 'let him amuse himself with writing against the Catholics, and in poring over the records in the Tweer'.

Had Charles in his mind a passage between Henry VIII. and John Leland, the Prynne of a former genera-tion? (See Leland, John, D. 1982, vol. 1., supra.) Accord-ingly, Prynne was made Keeper of the Records in the Tower; but he had no idea of being "kept quiet," and, being again elected M.P. for Bath, in 1661, in July of that year incurred the consure of the House of Commons for what it denominated a seditious libel, being Sundry Reasons, &c. against the new Intended Bill for Govern-ing and Reforming Corporations. The luckless scribe, whose strange fortune it was alternately to defend and attack and be attacked in return by every great party of his day, was reprimended by the Speaker and threatened with expulsion and prosecution. In his carlier days, doubtless, the intrapid combatant of king, archbishops. Protector, peers, and parliaments would have been "came for the fray;" but now he had "no stemach for the fight." for the fray?" but now he had "no stomach for the fight, and, whother it was that age had cooled his blood, argament convinced his reason, or the anticipated fast of Records bribed his integrity, confessing the alleged array and recanting his offensive language, he buried himself in his musty papers, forget the faults of the living at chronicing the annuls of the dead, and enriched this literature of his country with the most rainable of the any works, the Parliamentary Write and the Chronoal Records,

"In this calamitons state of things, the famous Prynne rose in his place and delivered a specifi in defence of the king's answer to the propositions of Parlament. Long as it is, I cannot but recommend it to an entire and attentive porusal. . . . You will soe it in Cobett, [Parl, Hist.: see Consert, William.]

"Cartainty a more striking exhibition of principle never occurred. Prynne was speaking in an assembly overawed by soldiers, in a situation that might have made a Roman shrink. Every reason that could Irritate the heart of man concurred to make him inveterate against the king. He had to preface his arguments with relating what he had endured from him Yet did this virtuous man continue to reason out his conclusion, bour after hour, with the most patient and penetrating sagacity. . . The subsequent events are but too well known. Cromwell and the army sent Colonel Prich to clear the house of all who were disposed to an accommodation with the king. The public execution of the sovereign followed. This cruel and droadful outrage has given occasion to much reasoning with respect to the nature of government and the original grounds of civil obedience."—Sagit's Lects. on Mod. Hist., Lect. XVI.

Although Prynne comes down no later than the death of Edward I., A.D. 1307, (end of vol. iii., pub. after his death,) had he lived he would have continued his Records (such at least was his intention) to the reign of Blizabeth. The value of Prynne's Records it would be difficult to exaggrante. Bishon Nisolaon's it would be difficult to exaggerate. Bishop Nicolson's unworthy sneer has done less injury to his author than unworthy snoor has done less injury to his author than to the commentator. He remarks,

"Most of the copies of these two tomes [vols. i. and ii.] perished in the dreadful fire of London, and no man has hitherto thought it worth his expense and while to give us a new edition from any of the few that escaped. His third has enough (in all conscionce) to satisfy any reasonable reader, and supersede his inquiry into the state of the case, in either former or following ages."—Eng. Hist. Lib., 139.

Had the Puritan left an annotation so discreditable to a historian, the bishop would have visited the offence with a red of iron. Much more to the purpose is the comment of the blunt Norroy-King-of-Arms, William Oldys:

"Tis certain that neither of the three Volumes have been so sufficiently used by, or even known to succeeding Writers of or upon our English Ristory, as such copious Materials, so carefully collected, do deserve."—Brit. Lib., 20, n.

It is hardly necessary to add that the works of Mr. Pugin are invaluable to the antiquary as well as to the artist and amblest to the artist and architect.

Pugin, Augustus Northmore Welby, 1811-1852, can of the preceding, and Professor of Boolesiastical An-tiquities at St. Marie s College, Oscott, whilst yet a youth of fourteen to sixteen years of age attracted attention by his probitectural scenery designed and painted for Her Majesty's Theatre and Covent Garden, (in which he assisted the Grieves,) and by his designs for furniture, plate, &c , (for Morel and Seddon, Rundall and Bridge, and others.) About 1834 he joined the Roman Catholic Church, and henceforth distinguished himself for his hearty seal in the schools of her doctrines and the adorument of her holy places. About a year before his death, his mind gave way under the constant pressure to which it had long been subjected by excessive action, and the discipline of a lunatic-asylum added another to the many sad hasons which seem to be the soonest forgotten by those to whom they should prove of the most profit. To the great joy of his friends, he was restored to reason. and on baturday, the 11th of September, 1902, he was carried to his "loved shode at Ramegate" but on the following Tuesday he was scized with a fit, and died on the same night A biographical notice of Mr Pugin, by his friend, Mr Talbot Bury, was published in The Builder, (see Sept or Oct 1802,) and another exetch of the deseased will be found in the trentleman a Magazine, Nov 1852, 634-655 see, also, March, 1853, 281, (sale of his Collection and Library,) Illus Lon News, Oct 2, 1854 He was three married and his widow enjoys a pension of £100 per annum from the Civil Last We have already noticed the assistance rendered by Mr. Pugin in the prenoticed the assistance rendered by Mr. Pugin in the pic paration of works published by his father, (see Pears, Augistic Nos. 1, 6, and 10) his own publications were the following: 1 Designs for Gothio Furniture, XVth Century, Lon. 18,6, r. 160. 2 Designs for Iron and Brass Work, XVth and XVIth Centuries, 1836, 400. 3 Designs for Gold and Silver Ornaments, XVth and XVIth Centuries, 1836, 160. 4 Details of Ancient Timber Houses, XVth and XVIth Centuries, 1836, 400. 5 Contrasts, or A Paratile Interest to Nobel Editions of the trusts or, A Parallel between the Noble Edifices of the AIVth and AVth Centuries and Similar Buildings of the Picsent Day, showing the Decay of Faste, accompanied by Appropriate Text, 1836, 4to, 2d ed, improved, 1841, 4to. This work, in which "the wretched state of architecture at the present day" is assailed in no gentle terms, offended many by telling (it has been remarked) "the bluntest and most disagreeable truths in the blunt est possible minner. But it's strictures are now regarded in a more favourable light. See Blackw Mag. Dec 1955 Modern Light Literature,—Art. 6. Mr. Myers beak for him so less than thirtydeath Pugin would allow no other builder to be an-ployed in carrying out his designs. He furnished many designs for monuments and Guthe metal-work, (in the designs for monuments and variety mosest ours in manufacture of which he are associated ours merelally with Messrs. Hardman of Bruningham, and practised landsonve-painting with great success. At Ramgate landsoape-painting with great success. At Ramegate this sealous and consoientions religionist (ever active in deeds of mercy to the living and the dead) creets as church, (8t. Augustines,) schools, &c, entirely at his own expense, and his body fitly rests in a vanit of the sacred edifice which in life he leved so well. In his rare intervals of leisure he sought recreation on the busom of the great deep, and was wont to ray that "there is nothing worth living for but Christian architecture and a boat" There have recently appeared 1, Recollections of A. "Speaker Onslow describes him as 'having the most popular parts for Julic speaking of any man he ever knew,' (Core's Life of Waljole, Append, v i) and there could not lea better witness. His style was correct and classical beyond that of all other men, and his unpremeditated compositions were as correct and clegant as his most prepared. The same high authority has recorded of his spirit and his fir, when upon popular topics, that it was the spirit and the fire by which the orstors of the ancient commonweitline governed the people. —John Browsman wid supra, 154.
"While Sir Robert Walpole was prime minister, a question access one day in the House between him and Pultency, Earl of Bath. It related to a pussage in Horace, on which they wagered a guinea. The bet was won by Pultency, and the identical guipsa may still be seen in the Bitteh Muscum, with the following note in the winner sown hand. 'thus guinea I destic may be kept as an holricom. It was won of 'if his best Walpole, in the House of Commons, he asserting the verse in Horace to be "Nall publicaere culpus," whereas I haid the wager of a guinea that it was "Nulla palicaere culpus." He sent for the book, and, being converged that he had lost, gave one this guinea. I told him I bould take the money without a blush on my side, but believed it was the only money he ever gave in the House where the giver and receiver ought not to blush. The guinea, I hope, will prove to my posterity the use of knowing Latin, and encourage them in their learning."

Putnam, George Palmer, b. Feb 7, 1814, at Brunswick, Maine, long and favourably known as a compiler of several good books and the publisher and distributor of many more, is descended (as are all the Putnams in the United States) from John Putnam, who Putnams in the United States) from John Fuknam, who emigrated from Buckinghamshire, England, to Salem, Mass in 1810 He is the great nephew of General Israel Putnam, and the grandson of General Joseph Palmer, who was a member of the Boston Revolutionary "toa party," a volunteer at Lexington and Bunker Rill, and a friend of Washington. After some year's expenses the book-saller in the city of New York, Mr. Patrience as a bookseller in the city of New York, Mr. Pu nam established a branch of the arm of Wiley & Putuam, in the same business, in London, where he resided from 1836 to 1847, an able and realous representative of American literary interests. Since the last named date he has been engaged as a publisher and beokreller in New York. Between the ages of 15 and 18 he compiled the first volume in the following list, and at the age of 29 edited The Bookseller's Advertiser, a monthly pure edited, (the first of the hind;) at which 12 Nos. were public.

in 1894. This journal was succeeded by Dayukinsh's Litterary World, 1847-53, and by other literary periodicals noticed on a preceding page: see Noaves, Oganizm B. ut supra. Quillinan, Edward, 1791-1851, a native of Oporto, of Irish descent, entered the Royal Army in 1808, and became a Lieutenant of the 3d Dragoon Guards; pub-lished "an elegant and piquant satire," entitled Ball-Room Votaries, and contributed other satirical effusions

(which resulted in his undertaking three duels) to a periodical called The Whim; in 1817 married Jemima Anne Deborah, second daughter of Sir S. Egerton Brydges, who died in 1822; in 1841 married the only daughter of the poet Wordsworth, (see Quillinan, Mrs. Dora;) and again became a widower in 1847. For some years before his death Mr. Quillinan resided in the beautiful valley between Ambleside and Rydal, near the residence of Wordsworth, and rosts near him in Grasmere Church. See Johnston's Memoir, (No. 7, infra;) Memoirs of Wm. Wordsworth, by his nephew, C. Wordsworth, 1851, 2 vols. 8vo; Lon. Gent. Mag., Oct. 1851, 438. He pub. many pleces in periodicals, and was the author of the following volumes: 1. Dunluce Castle; a Poem, Lee Priory Press, Kent, 1814, 4to. This was sarcastically reviewed by Captain Hamilton in Blackw. Mag., Oct. 1819, 574-579, (Poems by a Heavy Dragoon,) and the poet visited Edinburgh for the purpose of inviting his critic to the field. By a happy accident, however, they became excellent friends. "The very name was fascinating, and the public, who rushed upon it with all the eagerness of ou nosity, rose from it with untested appetite. When a family was numerous, the volumes slways flow, and were sometimes torn, from hand to hand, and the complaints of those whose studies were thus interrupted were a general tribute to the genus of the author. . . In general the Mysteries of Udolpho was at its first appearance considered as a step beyond Mrs. Radeliffe's former work, [The Romance of the Korest, high as that had justly advanced her. We entertain the same opinion in again reading them both, even after some years' interval. . . . With the majority of readers, the superior magnificence of landscape, and dignity of conception of character, secured the palm for the more recent work."—Six Walker Novelists.

"In order to raise strong emotions of fear and horror in the body of the work, the author is tempted to go to lengths to account for which the subsequent explanations seen interly leadequate. Thus, for example, after all the wonder and dismay and terror and expectation exclied by the mysterious chamber in the castle of Udolpho, how much are we disappointed and disjusted to find that all this pother has been raised by a waxen status!"—Intuly illistory of Fetiom.

MRS. RADOLIFFE AS A PROSE WRITER.

"The praise may be claimed for Mrs. Radeliffe of having been the first [1] to introduce into hee proce fictions a beautiful and fanciful ione of natural description and impressive narrative which had hitherto been exclusively applied to poetry. Fielding, Richardson, Smollett, even Walpols, though writing upon an imaginative autifect, are decidedly prose authors. Mrs. Radeliffe has a title to be considered as the first pootess of romantic fiction; that is, if actual rhythm shall not be deemed essential to poetry. . It may be true that Mrs. Radeliffer hather walks in fairy-land than in the region of realities, and that she has neither displayed the command of the human passions, nor the insight into the human heart, nor the observation of life and manners, which recommend other authors in the same line. But she has taken the lead in a line of composition appealing to those powerful and general sources of interest, a latent sense of supernatural awe, and curiosity concerning whatever is hidded and mysterious; and if she has been ever nearly approached in this walk, which we should hesitate to affirm, it is at lenst certain that she has never been excelled, or even equalled."—Six Walter Source: Life of Mrs. Radeliffs.

On a preceding page of the biographical sketch from

On a preceding page of the biographical sketch from which we have just quoted, Sir Walter throws out a few reflections on novel-reading which are well worth the consideration of the classes of critics for whom they are intended:

intended:
"Perhaps the perusal of such works may without injustice be compared with the use of opiates,—baneful when habitually and constantly resorted to, but of most blossed power in those moments of pain and languor when the whole head is sore and the whole head sick. If those who rail indiscriminately at this species of composition were to consider the quantity of actual pleasure which it produces, and the much greater proportion of real sorrow and distress which it alleviates, their pinlanthropy ought to moderate their critical pride or religious intolerance."

This is a very modest estimate of the claims of fiction

This is a very modest estimate of the claims of fiction, which in all ages has been a most potent teacher, as well as physician, friend, and comforter; but let the principle of selection which prevails in the choice of our other domestic guests be not neglected with reference to those who may influence so powerfully our hearts or our imaginations; surely there is enough to satisfy the taste for fiction in the characters and descriptions of such writers as Scott, Austen. Edgeworth, Cooper, Thackeray, and Dickens, without resorting to the assessins, the libertines, the haunted castles, and the borrid dungeons of Radcliffe, of Lewis, of Maturin, and of Godwin! As regards the lawfulness of this instrumentality, an eminent critic, the lawfulness of this instrumentality, an eminent critic, whose abundant stores of learning were always informed by the most wholesome common sense, remarks,

"His [Bunyan's] mind was now in a firm and healthy state. He saw that in employing fiction to make truth clear and goodness attractive, he was only fallowing the example which every Christian ought to propose to himself; and he determined to print [his Pilgrim's Progress.]"—Loan Macaular: Life of John Bunyan. Engy, Brit., 3th ed., v, 1854.

We continue our citations of opinions on our author:

"We would not pass over without a tribute of gratitude Mrs. Radcliffe's wild and wondrous tales. When we read them, the world seems shut out, and we breathe only in an enchanted region, where lovers' lutes tremble over placid waters, mouldering castles rise conscious of deeds of blood, and the sad volces of the past echo through deep vaults and lonely galleries. There is always majesty in her terrors. She produces more effect by whispers and sleader hints than ever was attained by the most vivid display of horrors. Her conclusions are tame and impotent almost without example. But, while her spells actually operate, her power is truly magical. ... Of all romance-writers, Mrs. Radcliffe is the most romantic,"—Sis T. Noon Talforms: New Monthly Mog.: repub. in his Miscellaneous Writings.

"Her descriptions of scehery, indeed, are vague and wordy to the last degree; they are neither like falvator nor Gaude, nor nature nor art; and she dwells on the effects of moonlight till we are sometimes weary of them; her characters are insiple,—the shadows of a shade, continued on, under different names, through all her novels; her story comes to nothing. But in herrowing up the soul with imaginary horrors, and making the surrivalled among her fair countrywomen. Her great power lies in describing the indefinable, and embodying a phantom. She makes her readers twice children. . All the factination that links the world of passion to the world unknow is hers, and she plays with it at

at Quebec, Oct. 1689, and laboured as a missionary among the Indians until 1724, when, with about thirty Indians, he was killed by a party of English. He compiled a Dictionary of the Abnaki Language, (1691, 4to, pp. 500,) the MS. of which is in the Harvard College Library. It was pub. in 1833 in the New Series of the Memoirs of the American Academy, vol. i., edited, with an Introduc-tion and Notes, by John Pickering, LL.D., who, in the Appendix to his Orthography of the Indian Languages of North America, 1818, had expressed a strong desire (in which Baron William von Hamboldt and other philologists united) to see it in print. Raicgh, Carew, 1604-1666, son of Sir Walter Raicgh, first saw the light in the Tower of London, where his father was a prisoner, and was educated at Wadham College, Oxford; was obliged to accept the reversion of his mother's pension (£400) instead of his inheritance: married the widow of Sir Anthony Ashley, (by whom he had two sons and three daughters,) and was soon afterwards made one of the Gentlemen of the King's Privy Chamber; in 1659, by the favour of Gene rat Monk, was appointed theorems of Jersey. In 1645 he wrote (see Howell's Letters) a vindication of his father against statements made by James Howell relative to the mine-affair at Quiana; and was also author of: 1. Ralegh, Philip, a grandson of Sir Walter Ralegh, prepared for publication his grandfather's Remains, his Premonition to Princes, and probably the Abridgment of his History of the World. See Ralegh, Sir Walters.

Ralegh, Raleigh, Rawly, Rawley, Raugh-leye, Rawleygh, or Rawleigh, Sir Walter, 1552 -1618, the second son of Walter Ralegh and his third wife, Catherine, daughter of Sir Philip Champernoun, and widow of Otho Gilbert, Esq., (father by her of Sir John, Sir Adrian, and Sir Humphrey Gilbert,) first opened his eyos on his father's farm, called Haye's, in the parish of East Budleigh, near the coast of Devonshire. He was entered a commoner of Oriel College, Oxford, in or about 1568; in 1569 enrolled himself with the volunteer corps which, under Henry Champernoun, visited France to fight the battles of the Huguenots; served five years in France, and subsequently in the Netherlands under the Prince of Orange; in 1579 accompanied his half-brother, Sir Humphrey Gilbert, on an expedition to North America, from which he returned without success; in 1580 was captain of a company of the royal troops sent to Ireland to suppress the Earl of Desmond's rebellion; in 1581 was associated with Sir William Morgan in the government of Munster; in 1582, by a good use of his dress and address, ingratiated himself with Queen Elizabeth, and was shortly afterwards knighted, made Captain of the Guard, Seneschal of the County of Cornwall, and Lord Warden of the Stannaries; also received a grant of 12,000 acres of the forfeited estates of the Earl of Desmend, and a lucrative patent for licensing the vendors of wine in England: in 1583 subscribed £2000 to the unfortunate See, also, Anthon's Blackst., 29.

and others, and in the same year was appointed one of the Council of War, and had command of the forces in Cornwall, of which county he was Lieutenaut-General; in 1588 furnished a ship and men to the expedition against the Spanish Armada, and was rewarded by an augmen-tation of his patent on wines, and the right to lay tonnage and poundage on them; in 1589 accompanied the Lisbon expedition under Drake and Norris, and on his return home visited Spensor the post at the castle of Kilcolman, in Ireland, (see Spensor's Colin Clovts Come Home Agains;) in 1892 sailed with fifteen ships to intercept the Spanish figet, but was recalled by the Queen, and on his return was imprisoned in the Tower in consequence of an intrigue with Miss Elizabeth (daughter of Sir Nicholas) Throgmerton, one of the Queen's Maids of Honour, (also sent to the Tower,) who became his devoted wife; after a short banishment from the court, during which he projected the discovery and conquest of El Derado, on February 5th, 1595, he sailed from Plymouth with five versels; arrived at Trinidad about the end of March; surprised arrived at Trindad about the end of March; surprised the two of Sun Josef and captured the thovernor, and ascended the Orinoco about sixty leagues; returned to England towards the end of summer, and in the next year delighted the world with his Discoveric of the large, Rich, and Beautiful Empyre of Guinna, 4to, pp. 112, (Latine, Norib., 1599, 4to; Dutch, 1612, 4to; and in Hakluvi's Collections. 4to, in 1605 are constituted with Haklayt's Collections, &c. :) in 1595 was employed, with the rank of rear-admiral, at the taking of Cadiz, where he was wounded in the leg; in 1597 took Fayal, and about the same time was restored to his post of Captain of the Guard, and appointed thovernor of Jersey: as a member of the House of Commons, gained favour by his advocacy of the free use of capital and labour, but as a politician incurred severe censure by his ungenerous hostility to the Earl of Essex and his abuse of his own Court interest in his treatment of Essex's adherents: on the accession of James I. fell into disgrace and danger; was committed to the Tower, on a charge of complicity with Cobham's treason, July, 1602, and tried and found guilty on that indictment, September, 1603; was deprived of his estates in favour of Carr, afterwards Duke of Som-erset, and lay a prisoner in the Tower for thirteen years, during which he composed his greatest work, the History of the World, and many minor productions; in 1615, by bribery of great men, and a promise to open a mino in Guiana, was released conditionally from prison, and subsequently equipped thirteen vessels for his American expedition; reached the coast of Guiana in November, 1617, and, being himself too unwell to ascend the Orinoco, despatched Captain Lawrence Keymis, who for twenty days (after an assault on St. Thomas, in which Raleigh's son was slain) scarched unsuccessfully for the coveted son was stain) scarcined unsuccessining for the covered mine, and committed suicide shortly after his return; arrived at Plymouth, July, 1618, and was arrested by Sir Lewis Stukley, (q. v.,) Vice-Admiral of Devonshire; adjadged by the Council (who desired to please the King of England and King of Spain) to be civilly dead by virtue of his former sentence, (September, 1603;) received sentence of death before the Court of King's Bench, October 28th, 1618, and beheaded the next morning, dying like a soldier and a Christian, in the sixty-sixth year of his age.

The sad tidings of the execution of this great man were received by the people of England with execrations so loud, deep, and long-continued that a venal council and an ungrateful king were at length slarmed, and made a lame attempt to justify their cruel deed:

made a lame attempt to justify their cruel deed:

"The disastisfaction at the proceedings against Sir Waiter was so general and public, that, in order to appease it, the King found it expedient to vindicate himself in a private declaration, [A forth every minute particular that could be urged in this own favour. This paper appeared in public, signed with the names of nine Privy-Counsellors; yet did it not prove sufficient to allay the marmours of the people, several of those particulars being observed to be misrepresented, and others appeared in a great tomacure aggravated. Hence the cry tail continued that Raleigh was sacrificed to the Spaniard."—Life of Raleigh, in Biog. Brit.,

Sir Walter was, as before remarked, the author of many works, and the reputed author of others, some of which he probably never saw. In the lists of Oldys and Birch in their Lives of Raleigh, (see, also, Biog. Brit., 1760, v. 484,) and that by Wood, augmented by Bliss, (Athen. Oxon., ed. 1813-20, ii. 240-249,) together with the late authorities noticed below, the bibliographer will find enough to perplex his judgment, and the scholar much to gratify his taste. The catalogue of the contents of the only edition of his writings which can pretend to any thing like completeness—The Works of Sir Walter Raleigh, Kt., now first collected: to which are prefixed the Lives of the Author, by Oldys and Birch, Oxford, 1829, 8 vols. 8vo, £3 15s., in sheets—runs as follows: vol. i., Advertisement: Life, by William Oldys; Life, by Thomas Birch, M.A.; The Trial of Sir W. must quote at least one scutence on this subject.

We hold it to be demonstralle, by a critical examination of the work testif, that it is throughout the composition of a single mind, bearing so it does in every paragraph, the impress of a unity and id nitry of literary latour which could only exist in the workmanship of one and the same hand. By no analysis of restructure se princes in two ding could it possibly be shown that there are in it in difference of composition justifying the iscription to present so done order to Raleigh and the rest to others——Falm Ret, April 1840, 70 Si Walter Raleigh.

"Of its style the fine pressgs above extracted will partly furnish the means of judging, but it would be necessary to prince in continuation some considerable portion of the market of its essy and qualify flew, its clearness and animation, its sweetness and microby in the plainties parts, and its general strength and dignity. In the stription of the periods there was no writer of his age so can rely free from stiffness and entire relations.

"O eloquent, just, and mighty Death!' one of the finest, if not the finest, passage in English prose — Rogers's Recollec, 1859,

Mr. Rogers also tells us that the fastidious Charles James Fox allowed Raleigh to be a very fine writer, (ubi eupra, 41.)

"The great instorians of this period, who condescended to use their native tongue, were Rideigh, Hayward, Knolles, Bacon, and Daniel, writers who, in this province, still hold no inferior rank among the classics of their country. RALEIGH AS A POST.

To an eminent bibliographer, whose services to English literature are commended on a preceding page, (372,) we are indebted for Poems of Sir Walter Raleigh, now first Collected, with a Biographical and Critical Introduction, by Sir S. E. Brydges, Kutt, Lee Princy Press, 1813, 4to; Lon., Longman's Private Press, 1914, 12mo. Wotton, Sir Walter Raieigh, and others; edited by the Rev. John Hannah, late Feilew of Lincoln College, Oxford. See Lon. Athen, 1846, 11, and 1861, 1 424, 469. Among the best known of Ralcigh's points are The Country's Recreations, A Vision upon the Concert of Spenser's Faeric Queeno, The Nymph's Reply to the Passionate Shepherd, (authorship questioned.) The Excuse written by Sir Walter Ralcigh in his Younger Years; and Sir Walter Ralcigh in the Unquiet Rest of his Last Sickness. The last two are not in Brydges a collection,

"No I pronounce Raleigh a port! Not, princps, in the judgment of a secret criticism. Raleigh, in his better days, was too much occupied in action to have critivated all the powers of a port, which require solitude and perpetual meditation, and a refinement of sensibility, such as intercourse with business and the world de idens. We have no proof that Raleigh powersed the copouts, with and creative powers of spanser, nor is it probal to that any cultivation would have 1 ought tooth from him funt equally rich. But even in the carches lengments new presented to the reader I think we can perceive some traits of attraction and excellence which pulning even Spanser wanted. If least diversified than the gifted band he would, I think, have sometimes been more foreible and soil line. His images would have been morein gigentic, and his reflections more during "—Sin S. It will be remembered that the author of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, long before the meep tion of that unmortal production, after successively choosing and rejecting for historical treatment the (rusade of Richard the First, the Barons' Wars against John and Henry the Third, the History of Edward the Bluk Prince, the Lives and Comparisons of Henry V and the Emperor Titus, the Life of Philip Sydney and that of

"At length I have fixed on Sir Walter Esteligh for my hero Rie eventual story is sarked by the characters of the salder and the salder, the courtier and historian and it may afford such fund of nuterials as I desire which have not yet been properly manufactured. — (Abbon's Miscell Works ed 1817-68, 11)

After nearly a twelvemouth of preluminary investiga tion, (vide p. 70, at supra,) this hero, too, was dropped, (for insufficient reasons, we think,) and thus the world lost that which would have cortainly been a great, what could not have been a satisfactory, performance. The time to write the Life of Raleigh had not then airrived it is now here. "The hour's come, but where's the man." Ralph, James, probably a native of Philadelphia, Penny, in 1724 accompanied Benjamin Lianklin to London, without waiting for the company of his wife for whose loss he seems to have consoled himself in no great time. In his new home he found it convenient to borrow the name and money (his theological speculations he had aircalv adopted) of his philosophic friend, and essayed, without much success, to instruct the young in the school and to amuse their elders on the stage. Has subsequently secured the notice of Bubb Dodington, Lord Melcombe, and became known as a wirm a therent of the faction of the Prince (Frederick) of Wales, a political journalist and pamphletter, a dramatist, a poet, and a historian. Ramsay had not the force of Burns; but weither, in just por-portion to his merits, is he likely to be felt by an English realism.

The fire of Burns's wit and passion glows through an obscure dislect by its confinement to short and concentrated bursts. The interest which Bannas execute a supread-over a long posts, deline ating mannars more than passions, and the mine must be at home both in the language and manners to at preclate the skill and come archiness with which he has beightened the display of rustic character without giving it ulgarity, and refined the view of peasant life by situations of suctiness and tendentess without departing in the least degree from its simplicity. Like the pottry of Tanos and Aricoto that of The bentil, Shepherd is engeaven on the memory of its native country. Ramsay, David, M.D., 1749-1815, a native of Inneaster county, Penna.; graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1765; after acting as tutor at Carlisle and in Maryland, studied medicine at the University of Pennatural in 1770-1881. sylvania, and in 1773 commenced practice in Charleston, South Carolina, where he resided for the rest of his life, He was for many years a momber of the Legislature of South Carolina, and in 1782, '83, '84, and '85 served in the national Congress, of which he was for one year President. His death was occasioned by a pistol-wound received in the streets of Charleston, May 7, 1815, from the hands of a lunatic. He was a zealous advocate of American Independence, and of public improvements of every character, an accomplished scholar, a man of fervent piety and expansive benevolence, and distinguished for every social virtue. His first wife was the daughter of President Witherspoon, and his second (see RAMSAY, MARTHA LAURENS, infra) the daughter of Henry Laurens. Oration on American Independence, Charleston, 1778, 4to. 2. "With regard to Dr. Ramsay's book, it is plainly an abridgment of Mr. Marshall's, written, we presume, upon the supposition that a moderate octave is more likely to be read than five massy quartos. In other respects it hears all the lineaments of its bulky progenitor. It is quite as well written, and contains all the private history that is to be found in the other, but without the addition of one original sketch or anecdote. . . In these volumes [Marshall's and Ramsay's] we have found a great many words and phrases which English criticism refuses to acknowledge."—Edin. Rev., Oct. 1808, 151, 170: Lices of Washington.

"He had, moreover, a more cultivated historical sense than Marshall, and used language more effectively... But his narrative, though clear, wants colour. It has movement without vivacity; distinctness without graphic power. He tells the story, but fulls to paint the scenes or the men. And thus, with a kind of knowledge which none but a contemporary can possess, with ample materials to draw from, and abundant means of vorifying every statement by direct conference with actors still in the full possession of their faculties, he has left us a meager volume, which must always be consulted, though it will seldom be read."—Herner W. Vols. i.-iii., first pub. 1816-17, have been already noticed: see No. 15. Rammay's biographer calls this "his last and greatest work." "With a view of reducing all valuable historical facts within a small compan, to form a digest for the use of those whose Resure would not admit of more extensive reading, this great work was undertaken."

To these volumes, first suggested in 1768 by a desire to abridge the Universal History, 65 vols, (see Bower, Archibai n, p 227, supra) Ramsay devoted many of his lesure hours for the space of forty years. The prespectus of the work ($? per vol in boards) will be found in the North American Review, Sept 1915, 443-445 a notice of the first three volumes has been cited under No 15. The remaining nine volumes seem to have failed to attract notice of any sort, they fell dead from the to attract notice of any sort they fell dead from the press and who can marvel who puzzles his brains over the thrice absuid title of the work?

Raspe, Rudolph Ltich. The following erticle was prepared for us by a friend some years ago, since which time several editions of 'Munchiusen's Iravels" have been published, especially one in quarto with ample and bolt illustrations by Gustave Dorf which appeared in London about 1967, without date, but as published by Cassel, Petter & Galpin, Ludgate Ibil. This brithant chition like its preducesors of all kinds, has no regular or sufficient account of the origin or the author of the fictions it contains although in its preface, which is pleasant and well worth reading, the book itself is conjectured to be a collection of curious mordents and adventures from various sources made by a (crman named Rayle. Still, the mane of the so called collector of the incidents of the work is given as somewhat doubtful and he is regarded as deriving his materials generally from learned and raio books. In fact, his main urpers a surposed as it had been frequently supposed etcic, to be that of ridiculing Bin es Irwels, whose truth was at one period often unjustly called in question, lut which could not have been a matter in Raspes mind when he was writing, since his little bo k was printed nearly viv years before Bruce a five large volumes of frivels had appeared Of course, nearly every thing seems now as unsettled as ever about Munchauson's Munchauson's Iravely and its author

We propose therefore, to give the principal facts con cerning the life of a man who wrote one of the most popular and successful books that over was published, well as concerning his motives and rescuices for writing it and to give them, too, as they were familiarly known to many eminent persons in Gottingen who had been much acquainted with the distinguished parties concerned less than twenty five years carber than the in their history and late, or to talk about thom, and espe-cially about the strange adventures, the real learning and miscial le crimes of Rusje himself, who wrote Munchausen a travels for tread, when he was in want and disgrace, mistial le crimes of Rasje himself, who wrots Munchausan's Iravels I rivead, when he was in want and diagrass. Here I styles in any conjectures concrining the origin in the auth ribility of the section in Birch Munchausen's Tervels. I leaved in his I exteen (v. I. xi. j. f. 2. 1811.) says that Radolph Fr. h. Again Vira Brewster, in her Letters from Cames and Nice (1867 p. 15.) exclaims. Paron Munchausan is here, which she explains 1.3 siding that there was a person of that name at Nice, who said that the of his ancestors had a chaptain who was famons for drawing a key bow, and that his patron, the Baron of those days, work a book outhercoding better of the part excellence. "Soon after the appearance of Munchessen's Travels in Rage land, the little book was naturally carried to Germany and became known in the kingdom of Hanover. Goltfried August Bürger, author of the famous ballad of Lénore, was then living at Gittingen, almost as poor as Raspe, and quite as unprincipled. He, too, was a personal acquaintance of Munchansen's,—bad enjoyed his riotous hospitality and had heard his wild stories. As a promising literary adventure, he translated the little book of Raspe, and made additions to it from the stores of his own memory, so that it was published in 1767 and 1788 in two editions, or perhaps only with a changed little-page, at Gittingen, not very far from where Munchansen lived, and where his habits and stories were perfectly well known. But this was more than the first-hunting baron could submit to. He therefore took legal proceedings against Bürger and against the bookselling house and stories were perfectly well known. But this was more than the fox-hunting baron could submit to. He therefore took legal proceedings against Blürger and against the lookselling house who were his publishers, and so thoroughly alarreed them that the imprint of 'Loudon' instead of 'döttingen' was put on the copies that had not been sold, and subsequently, as the matter was still further pressed, the remainder of the edition was destroyed, and the ault stopped by the full submission of the offending parties. The work itself seems to have been little noticed in the German journals of the time; but in the 'Aligemeine Deutsche Bibliothek,' to which Raspo is said earlier to have been a contributor, a review of the 'Travels' begine by saying, 'This is a collection of lies long ago told by Baron M., but probably invented, in part, by the anonymous author of this missrable book.' "The 'mescrable book,' however, has since gone its way over the world triumphantly, little regarding law or truth. It has been translated into many languages; printed and reprinted in all forms; altered and enhaged; and, although generally injured by the changes it has undergone, it has mover been absolutely spoiled by any of them. It would be difficult to find a dozen books of annusement in modern time and when the cultivated; affording materials arts, and happy illustrations for truth and continued to the cultivated; affording materials arts, and happy illustrations for truth could be a first of controse, poets, and the cultivated; affording materials arts, and happy illustrations for truth a first of controse, poets, and the cultivated; affording materials arts, and happy illustrations for truth and the cultivated; affording materials arts, and happy illustrations for truth and the cultivated; affording materials arts, and happy illustrations for truth and the cultivated; affording materials arts, and happy illustrations for truth was a mistake to make it so large in the cultivated; affording materials arts, and happy illustrations for tr

however, of Baron Minchaused that we have seen, is an annoncement by Trilliner, come time cince, that he was printing a Russian translation of his wild fictions,

"On the other hand, Ruspe has rarely enjoyed the honours, whatever they may be, to which he is outside as their author. Indeed, in 1811 he was inquired after in the Gentleman's Magazine (vol. laxid, iii., p. 147) s a forgottent, caralist; and though a notice of him, written in Depping, the besterian, is to be found in the 'Biographic Universelle,' it is besterian, is to be found in the 'Biographic Universelle,' it is besterian, is to be found in the 'Biographic Universelle,' it is besterian, is to be found in the 'Biographic Universelle,' it is besterian, is to be found in the 'Biographic Universelle,' it is besterian, is to be found in the 'Biographic Universelle,' it is besterian, is to be found in the 'Biographic Universelle,' it is besterian, is to be found in the 'Biographic Universelle,' it is besterian, is to be found in the 'Biographic Universelle,' it is besterian, is to be found in the 'Biographic Universelle,' in the Internation, in fact, in fact, related to the 'Biographic Universelle,' in Century ago from several of the professors and other men of learning in (Bittingen who had known well Munchausen, Bürger, and Raspe, and who were familiar with all the circumstances relating to the origin and publication of 'Munchausen's Travels' in England and German, "There is no end to the reprints of this famous book, in all languages, but especially in German and English: many of them with rude engravings, but the greater number relying wholly on the stories themselves, which, in truth, need no additions make them attractive. The best, perhaps, and certainly the most currous, is the third English edition, which was the amplest issued by Raspe himself. It contains the two stories about the wild animal shot by a cherry-stone, and the sounds that were forzen up and thawed out, both of which, being in Southey's Portuguese review and in the 'Mendacla Rid

"On the life of Herodotus and the historical notes and essays Mr. Rawlinson has bestowed much loving caro and diligence: there is scarcely an ancient or molecus writer whom he does not seem familiar with, and what light recent Oriental discovery serves to throw on the topics of the history, the editor avails himself of amply, having secured such distinguished associates and referees as Sir Heary Rawlinson and Sir Gardinor Wilkinson. The result is, as far as life and notes and appendices go, the completest English edition of Herodotus yet published.

One book only of Herodotus is translated in this volume, 300 pages of appendices occupying more than half the romainder, and forming the most valuable portion of the work.

The work throughout is enriched by excellent maps and illustrations.

We have compared the present version with the versions of Littlebury leide p. 1108, supraj and Beloe, fride p. 162, supraj, and Beloe, fride p. 162, supraj a Mr. Rawlinson has bestowed much loving care and diligence: there is scarcely an ancient or modern writer whom he does not

Ray, or Wray, John, Nov. 29, 1627—Jan 17, 1704— 5, a native of Black-Notley, near Braintree, Essex, where his father was a blacksmith, after pursuing his studies for some time at Catherine Hall, Cambridge, removed to Trinity College, and there, in company with Issac Bar-row, attained the honour of a minor Fellowship in 1649, being chosen major Fellow when he had completed his Master's degree. In 1651 he was made Greek Lecturer of the College; in 1653, Mathematical Lecturer; in 1655, Humanity Reader; in 1660 was ordnined deacon and priest, but never had a parochial cure, and in 1682 resigned his Fellowship rather than sign the Act of Uniformity, which required a subscription against the Solema League and Covenant; from 1663 to 1666 accompanied his friend and former pupil, Francis Willughby, on a scientific expedition on the continent, the former attending to botany and the latter to zoology; in 1667 became a Fellow of the Royal Society, the Transactions of which he enriched by the results of some of his observations; in 1672 lost his friend Willughby, who bequeathed him the guardian-ship of his sons and £60 per annum. His latter years were spent in his native place, Black-Notley, where he resided in a house of his own building. He died in the resided in a noise of his own building. Its died in the communion of the Church of England, to which he was much attached. This learned and excellent natural philosopher was the first to lay down correct principles of classification in the vegetable and animal kingdoms, and his works have been freely drawn from by later naturalists, both at home and abroad, as we shall see below. 1. The student of natural history must not neglect the following sources of information respecting this eminent man and his works: Derham's Life of Ray, (ut supru;) and and his works: Dernam's Lite of Any, (as supra), the biographical notices of him in Biog. Univ., by Cuvier and Du. Petit. Thomas; in Rees's Cyo., by Sir J. E. Smith; Pultency's Sketches; Haller's Bibl. Bot.; Biog. Brit.; Hallam's Lit. Hist. of Europe; Memorials of Ray, by B. We have referred to the Ray Society. This title is per-haps a greater honour to the naturalist than that of the enus of plants known as the Raiana, (Plumier.) The genus of plants known as the Ralana, (Plumer.) The Ray Society was established in 1844, for the purpose of giving to the world "new and carefully edited editions of rare books of established merit, unique MSS., and translations of works on Zoology and Botany, illustrated with five engravings from the most recent discoveries."

From 1844 to 1856, 28 vols. (18 8vo and 10 fol.) were issued. Sets are very rare, but occasionally can be beight at about twelve guiness. See Lon. Gent., Mag., Aug. 1851, 176; Athen., 1845, 704, 989.

Linneau and Buffon are largely indebted to the works of Ray, and Courier traces the principal facts maded.

Linnsus and Buron are intgoty mattered at a noted in Bay, and Cuvier traces the principal facts noted in Daubenton and Hauy's Dictionnaire d'Ichthyologie (in Daubenton and Hauy's Ray's treatises on fishes. Re-Encyc. Methodique) to Ray's treatises on fishes. Respecting his zoological works, it is the remark of the eminent authority just quoted,

"They may be considered as the foundation of modern zoology, for naturalists are obliged to consult themevery instant, for the put pose of olearing up the difficulties which they meet with in the works of Linneus and his copyists. . . The particular distinction of his inhose of non an arrangement more clear, there determines, than those of any of his predecessors, and applied with more consistency and procision. His distribution of the character operation and the character of quadrupeds and birds has been followed by the

It will be seen (Williams, Francis, injec) that Swainson considers that Williaghby is justly entitled to much of the praise which has been lavished on Ray as the founder of systematic zoology.

As a botanist, the merits of Ray have been thus succinctly enumerated:

oinetly enumerated:

"In the botanical works of Ray we find the natural families of plaints better defined, the difference of complete and incomplete flowers more precise, and the grand division of monocotyledous and diocyledous fully established. He gave much precision to the characteristics of many classes, and introduced saveral technical terms, very useful for the perspicuity of totanical language; finally, he established many general principles of arrangement which have since been adopted. Ray's method of classification was principally by the fruit, though he admits its imperfections. 'In fact, his method,' says Putteney,' though he assumes the fruit as the foundation, is an elaborate attempt, for that time, to fix natural classes.'"—HALLAM: wbi sap., iii. 488.

"The next accurate in observation, the most philosophical in contemplation, and the most faithful in description, samogest all the locanists of our own, or perhaps any other, time."—Sta James Roward Smitt: Rees's Cyc.

As a writer, Ray is justly entitled to very high praise:

As a writer, Ray is justly entitled to very high praise: "Our countryman, the excellent Mr. Ray, is the only describer that conveys some precise does in every term or word, maintaining his supercort; over his followers and imitators, in spite of the advantage of fresh discovering and modern information."

REV. GLERKET WHYES: Natural Hist. of Schborne, Letter XIV.

It is gratifying to be able to add that his character as a man admirably supported his high rank as a scholar and an author:

"His varied and useful labours have justly caused him to be regarded as the Father of Natural History in this country; and his character is, in every respect, such as we should wish to belong to the individual enjoying that high distinction. His claims to the regard of posterity are not more founded on his intellectual capacity than on his moral excellence."—Memoir of Ray, in Naturalist's Library, Entomology, vol. vii. 60.
"He found the highest wisdom to consist in the cordial recoption of the revealed will of Ocd, and in unfeigned subjection to it."—Orms: Bild. Bild., 368.

In scientific knowledge he was far in advance of his age; but his contemporaries knew and valued his abilities and acquirements:

"The best Botanist and the most accomplish'd Naturalist of this or perhaps any age. . . Of vast Memory, exact Judgment, universal Knowledge, and extraordinary Talestas."—Philosoph Letters of Ray, etc., 1718, 8vo, pp. 161, 153, 164. "Ray, who first supplied materials for the argument for natu-ral religion, drawn from final causes."—Pararas: Crit. Hist. of Prez Thought, 1883, Lect. VIII., Note 40.

We cannot better conclude this, the latest sketch of Ray's life and labours, than with the words of his friend and first biographer:

"In his dealings, no man more strictly just; in his conversation, no man more humble, courteous, and affable; towards Cod, no man more devout; and towards the poor and distressed, no man more compassionate and charitable according to his abilition."—Dr. Debnam: Life of Ray, in Solect Remains of the March 12, 1822, in Chester, Pennsylvania; removed to the city of Circinnati at the age of fourteen, and became a pupil of Clevenger the sculptor. On the departure of this eminent artist to Europe, Read turned his attention to painting, in which art he soon acquired reputation. In 1849 he removed to Boston, where he married and resided for five years, varying devotion to his easel by the composi-tion of poetry, (published in the Boston Courier, Gra-ham's Magasine, and other periodicals,) some of which elicited the commendation of Mr. Longfellow. Thuse encouraged, he gave to the world a number of volumes, which we shall presently notice in the order of their publication. In 1846 he removed to Philadelphia; passed a year in Florence, 1850-51; again visited Italy in 1853 and subsequent years; and since his late return to America has resided chiefly at Philadelphia and Cipcionati, practising his favourite profession with reputa-tion and success.
